

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

P R E F A C E.

THE importance and value of a dictionary of a language are understood and appreciated by all. If I find a word in a book, or hear a word used by another, which I do not fully comprehend, I have nothing to do but refer to my dictionary, where all the needful information is before me. I have now increased my stock of knowledge, and can use the word myself in speaking or writing, and comprehend it when used by others. Another link is added to those ties which bind me to society; my capacity for giving and receiving valuable information and innocent pleasure is enlarged. It is now natural for me to reason with myself, that if the knowledge of only one new term of thought be so desirable, because so useful, how would my usefulness and happiness be increased by larger additions to my stock of mental wealth! A life spent in the acquisition of knowledge, surely would be a happy life! But few men can so devote their whole time, and if this were practicable, life is too short for any one man to possess himself of all the secrets of nature, the discoveries of science, and the triumphs of art. I cannot at the same time, gaze with the astronomer, explore with the voyager, calculate with the mathematician, and experiment with the philosopher. But it occurs to me that there is a mode in which I may, to a large extent, avail myself of the results of the labours of others. These have been given to mankind through the medium of the press. I can, therefore, devote my leisure time to such profitable reading as shall make me acquainted with much of which I must otherwise be ignorant. Reading is that art by which I am enabled to avail myself of the recorded wisdom of mankind. But here a practical difficulty suggests itself. The multiplicity of books, even in my own language, renders a careful selection absolutely indispensable. It has been computed that of the 650,000 (?) volumes in the English language, about 50,000 would repay a perusal! Suppose a person to read 100 pages a day, or 100 volumes a year, it would require 500 years to exhaust such a library! How important is it, then, to know what to read! And how shall this knowledge be obtained? Now let us revert to our opening remarks upon the value of a dictionary of words. If there be such an advantage in full definition, in alphabetical arrangement, and consequent facility of reference, why should we not have a dictionary of books and authors as well as of words? Suppose that I wish to know whether Hume or Lingard's History of England, or Spenser's Poems, or Burke's Speeches, or Thomson's Seasons, are desirable works for my school, my library, my parlour table;—or suppose I wish to know the personal history of these authors—of Hume, Lingard, Burke, Thomson—what trouble I shall have in obtaining the desired information! But if I had a Dictionary of Literary History and Biography, I have nothing to do but turn to H, or L, or B, or T, and I am at once in possession of what I seek. But is there any such work to be had? It is a remarkable fact that, notwithstanding the obvious advantages of such a work, there was none such in print before the present publication. There were, indeed, meagre “Compendiums of English Literature,” and “Comprehensive Cyclopædias,” the largest of which (with the exception of a book of titles of works) contains about 850 out of more than 80,000 authors! Much of such knowledge, too, is found scattered here and there in expensive biographical compilations, which can never become popular, because very costly, and are, indeed, insufficient authorities in literary history.

Deeply lamenting this serious deficiency in the English Republic of Letters, the compiler determined to undertake the preparation of the long-desired work, and he now has the pleasure of presenting to the public the results of labours extending over a long period, and pursued with unwearied zeal, in “A CRITICAL DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE AND

BRITISH AND AMERICAN AUTHORS, LIVING AND DECEASED, FROM THE EARLIEST ACCOUNTS TO THE MIDDLE OF THE 19TH CENTURY."

The principal features of the work are the following:

1. It is arranged in alphabetical order, to insure facility of reference.

2. While professing to chronicle only British and American authors, in our College of Letters, we have sometimes overlooked the question of nativity, and enrolled a writer whose insignia of literary nobility could properly be quartered on an English field. That, indeed, would be a prodigal parsimony which should exclude from the national coffers of intellectual wealth, the superscriptions of Anselm, Lanfranc, Benoit De Sainte-Maur, and Peter of Blois.

3. As a general rule, a succinct biography is given of each author of note. The length of such notice, of course, depends upon his prominence as an individual, and his rank as an author. Those of the first class, such as, Addison, Anselm, Ascham, Bacon, Burke, Byron, Bryant, Chaucer, Chillingworth, Clarendon, Cowper, Davy, Dryden, Dwight, Edwards, Everett, Franklin, Gildas, Gibbon, Hallam, Hall, Henry, Irving, Johnson, Laud, Leighton, Locke, Milton, More, Newton, Otway, Paley, Pope, Prescott, Robertson, Roscoe, Savage, Spenser, Shakspeare, Sherlock, Southey, Sparks, Taylor, Thomson, Tynedale, Usher, Vanbrugh, Wace, Warburton, Walpole, Watts, Waterland, Wood, Young, and SEVERAL THOUSAND OTHERS, are treated at considerable length. Less space is devoted to those less distinguished. The number of authors whose works are noticed is about 80,000, a far greater number of English writers than has ever before been brought together in any work, or indeed in all previous publications.

4. The most valuable feature of the work is now to be mentioned. Compilers of manuals of literature have almost universally fallen into the great error of giving their own opinions, almost exclusively, upon the merits or demerits of the authors under consideration. Now, these opinions may be valuable or not: the public generally neither ask nor care what their views may be. This capital error is avoided in the present work. The compiler occasionally ventures an opinion of his own, but this will be merely supplemental to opinions better known and more highly appreciated by the reading public. As a carefully prepared RECORD OF THE OPINIONS OF GREAT MEN UPON GREAT MEN, this work will prove an invaluable guide to the student of literary history. For instance, able criticisms upon the speeches and literary productions of EDMUND BURKE have been written or spoken by such men as M. Cazalés, Charles James Fox, Sir James Mackintosh, Dr. Johnson, Curran, Wilberforce, the Duke de Levis, Gerard Hamilton, Dr. French Laurence, Lord Eldon, Dr. Parr, Robert Hall, the Emperor of Germany, the Princes of France, the King of England; in modern times, by Lord Brougham, Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Macaulay, and many others. Now, such criticisms and commendations, invaluable as they are, are floating about in books and pamphlets, often difficult to procure, and troublesome to examine. In the present work they will be found, in the whole or in part, arranged in a few pages under the name of BURKE. Such an article alone is well worth the price of the whole book. When Mr. BRYANT was a youthful poet his effusions were most favourably noticed by that first class authority, the LONDON RETROSPECTIVE REVIEW, as well as by other periodicals and critics. Some years later, CHRISTOPHER NORTH and WASHINGTON IRVING (then in London) displayed their good taste by warmly applauding the "thoughts that breathe and words that burn" of the great American bard. In the present work the reader has only to turn to the name of BRYANT, to find an account of these and other interesting facts connected with Mr. B.'s poetical career. So a reference to the name of WASHINGTON IRVING will place him in possession of the prominent events connected with the life of this distinguished ornament of English literature. In like manner are noticed the works and lives of the principal living (as well as deceased) British authors:—HALLAM, BROUGHAM, MACAULAY, DICKENS, BULWER LYTTON, &c.

5. The laudable curiosity of the bibliomaniac, or lover of rare works, is not forgotten in this volume. Occasional notices are given of "The small, rare volume, black with tarnished gold."

(Ferriar's "Bibliomania," p. 11: Epistle to Richard Heber, Esq.) whilst the early ROXBURGHE FESTIVALS, the tournaments at Leigh and Sotheby's, and the triumphs of DIEDIN, HEBER, and THORPE, claim respectful remembrance.

6. The second division of this work consists of a copious index of subjects, so that the inquirer can FIND AT A GLANCE ALL THE AUTHORS OF ANY NOTE IN THE LANGUAGE, ARRANGED UNDER THE SUBJECT OR SUBJECTS UPON WHICH THEY HAVE WRITTEN. Under AGRICULTURE, the farmer will find authors' names alphabetically arranged; and by turning to each one, can see the title or titles of his work or works, and probably an estimate of the value of his labours. So in ANTIQUITIES, CHEMISTRY, DIVINITY, DRAMA, LAW, POLITICAL ECONOMY, BIOGRAPHY, &c. This arrangement, the compiler considers, will confer an inestimable value upon the work. He thus presents to the public, in one volume, a COMPREHENSIVE MANUAL OF ENGLISH LITERATURE—authors and subjects—a MANUAL WHICH IS TO THE LITERATURE OF THE LANGUAGE WHAT AN ORDINARY DICTIONARY IS TO THE WORDS OF THE LANGUAGE.

7. The value of the work can be best seen by a comparison with other works of a somewhat similar character.

1. THE BIOGRAPHIA BRITANNICA (complete), in 7 folio volumes, comes down to a no later period than 1766; 5 volumes of a new edition were published, 1778-98, extending to letter E, and part of F. The number of authors noticed is few, and, of course, it excludes all those who have died within the last sixty-two years, and all recent discoveries in literary biography. These twelve bulky volumes, which are now rarely to be met with, are worth about $85 to $40.

2. CHALMERS'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY, 32 vols. 8 vo., 1812-17, contains in all less than 9000 names, of which perhaps 2500 are those of British authors; it is sold at from $45 to $55. It contains no author who has died within about forty years. Our work gives 25,000 to 30,000 names of British and American authors (including the living) to the present time.

3. WATT'S BIBLIOTHECA BRITANNICA, 1824, 4 vols., 4to., like the other works named above, is a very valuable compilation. It contains the names of about 22,500 British, and perhaps 100 to 200 early American, authors. Of biographical notices it is almost destitute; in many cases giving a line where our work gives a column. It sells for $40 to $50.

4. LOWNDES'S BIBLIOGRAPHER'S MANUAL, 1824, 4 vols., 8vo., gives no biography of consequence, few modern names, and very meagre critical notices, where any at all are presented. It is but little more than a catalogue of titles, though a work of much value to a bibliographer. It meets with a rapid sale at $24 to $28, and is now very scarce.

5. THE NEW BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY, (Rose's) 12 vols., 8vo., 1848, contains about 3700 names of British and American authors, excluding all living. It sells for $30 to $40.

6. CHAMBERS'S CYCLOPEDIA OF ENGLISH LITERATURE is a most valuable work, and should be in all libraries; but as a map of English literature it is very defective, though from no fault of the intelligent editor, Mr. Robert Chambers. He designed to give specimens of the works of a few authors, rather than a history of British and American authors and literature. The bulk of his work is made up of extracts from the few authors noticed. Of these there are 882 only, who are all included in our own work, and some 25,000 to 30,000 in addition! Not only have we all of the British authors noticed by Chambers, but all included in Watt's BIBLIOTHECA BRITANNICA, in Lowndes's BIBLIOGRAPHER'S MANUAL, in Rose's BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY, 1848, 12 vols., 8vo., Cleveland's COMPENDIUM OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, &c.; all of the American authors to be found in R. W. Griswold's compilations, in Allen's American Biographical Dictionary, and many more, both British and American, never before included in a work of this kind. If it be asked, how is it possible for us to have compressed so vast a quantity of information into one volume, we answer that, though we give only one volume, yet this contains the matter of more than thirty ordinary 12mo. volumes of 850 pages each. It is needless to enlarge upon the superior convenience for reference which one large volume possesses over a number of smaller ones.

We shall now proceed to show the weighty claims which our work presents to the attention of the members of the various professions, and the public generally.

1. The CLERGYMAN will find it an invaluable guide in his professional duties. How often is he at a loss to know what books to refer to, when pursuing some interesting and useful branch of study! We are bold to say that there is no work in the language, with the exception of this volume, which will answer his purpose. HORNE'S INTRODUCTION, and ORME'S BIBLIOTHECA BIBLICA, treat of works which relate to the Scriptures, only. WILLIAMS'S CHRISTIAN PREACHER, and BICKERSTETH'S CHRISTIAN STUDENT, and some other manuals of a similar character, are very defective in bibliography, and so partial to those who agree, and (unintentionally) unjust to others who disagree, with the peculiar views of the compilers, that the advocate is apparent, where the judge alone should be heard. Now our work contains almost, if not quite, all of the critical notices included in these works, and many others of a different complexion. The clergyman has only to turn to the class headed "DIVINITY," and the theological treasures of the English language are laid open to his view. By such guidance, instead of purchasing his books at random, and diminishing his means by the cost of works, which he finds, on examination, unsuited to his purpose, he can at once lay his hands upon exactly what he needs. If he wish to add to his library works of a miscellaneous character, he can consult this ever-present, well-informed friend at his elbow, who will indicate those works which are suitable, and those which are unsuitable, for his library shelves and parlour table.

2. The LAWYER will find in our work copious notices of books in his profession, from ARCHBOLD to VINER. The article "LAW," in the Index, will enable him to discover at once the title and date of, and frequently valuable critical opinions from the highest authorities upon, the legal treatise which is to enable him to study intelligently the important case, the management of which is, perhaps, to make or mar his professional reputation.

3. The DOCTOR OF MEDICINE is often at a loss to lay his hands upon a treatise which will enable him to master the diagnosis of some disease, which has baffled his skill, or must be explained to his class. He has no medical bibliographer to consult; or he may hesitate to admit ignorance in quarters where professional rivalry may not always keep the secret. Our Library of English Literature is on his shelf, is consulted, has relieved him from his difficulty, and he commends the wisdom of the profitable purchase.

Abernethy's Digestive Organs, Medea's Pestilential Contagion, or Watt's Consumption, soon smiles grimly in his library; the patient is soon well enough to laugh at his doctor, the medical students are dismissed, "wiser," if not "better, men," and our Æsculapius walks forth, the admiration of his fellow citizens, as a marvel of erudition.

4. In like manner, the MERCHANT who desires to be acquainted with the literature of his profession, and the ARTIST who is looking for the best manuals of his calling, or the biographies of those who have graven their names with the chisel upon the eloquent marble, or stamped their fame upon the glowing colours of the speaking canvass,—has here a sure resource.

5. The AGRICULTURIST can learn the most recent improvements in the treatment of lands, and provide himself with those stimulants to production, without which, no farmer can now compete with his intelligent neighbour.

6. And let not the WORKING MAN say to such a manual as ours, "I have no need of thee. I am no scholar, and have no time to read, even if I felt the desire. I do, indeed, sometimes lament my ignorance and inability to understand much of what I read in the papers, but it is too late for me to learn." A plea of this kind confutes itself.

Our MECHANIC admits that he is often mortified at his ignorance. Why then should he voluntarily remain in ignorance? As to the alleged "want of time," this is altogether an error. The excuse may be valid in one case in ten thousand: as the odds are so great, we feel justified in never admitting its validity. We will venture to assert that, almost without an exception, every man, woman, and child, who complains of want of time for the discharge of neglected duties, can find time enough when inclination becomes the manager. In the busiest season, will not time be found for that amusement, that recreation, which may be ardently desired by the one who complains of being so much burdened? We say to the working man or woman, apprentice, boy, or girl, determine to improve your mind, to add to your stock of knowledge, and you will find time enough. In time, as in money, it is neglect of the fragments which consumes the store. Who could not, if so disposed, save for reading one hour per day? Not, perhaps, in one term, but a few minutes here and there, until the aggregate should amount to the time supposed. If the working day be ten hours in length, we have the following result:

One hour per day is, in a year, three hundred and sixty-five hours—thirty-six days and a half—that is, about five weeks in a year. Does not this surprise you? How much knowledge you will be possessed of next year, if you devote five weeks to its acquisition this year! In ten years you will, at the same rate, have devoted one year to reading. Here is time enough in which to learn two languages, or to read through more than one hundred volumes!

If you say that one hour is too much time per day to assume as a basis, then take half an hour, or a quarter, or five minutes only, and you will see that it is still worth saving. Be assured that the position you hold among your neighbours, your respectability, your usefulness, is mainly dependent upon the amount of knowledge you possess. If you, honest shoemaker, or carpenter, can tell your group of neighbours who Franklin was, what Burke was distinguished for, why Shakspeare is so much admired, in what year Washington was born and when he died—if you can tell them about such things, when you meet with the names of these or other men in the village newspaper, every one of your neighbours will respect you the more for your knowledge.

If you, apprentice boy—you, young maiden—can inform your parents of the philanthropic labours of a Wilberforce and a Howard, of the eloquence of a Henry, a Chatham, or a Clay, of the discoveries of a Davy, or a Fulton, or a Newton, be sure your knowledge will "not fall to the ground."

What, indeed, intellectually considered, distinguishes a man from a brute, but education? Before the genius of such men as Edmund Burke and John Milton, the world has bowed in heartfelt deference; but had Burke and Milton been without education—had they been North American Indians, for instance, what would their genius have done for them? It might have enabled them to make a better canoe, or scalp more enemies, or construct handsomer wigwams, than their fellows; but if transplanted into civilized life, they would, in usefulness to society, have been many degrees inferior to the youth in the public school. Such is the importance of knowledge, which is truly "power!" Therefore, delay not to acquire so inestimable a treasure!

A recent illustration of the pecuniary advantages of knowledge, may properly conclude this portion of our subject. An operative in a cotton factory subscribed three dollars a year for a magazine. In this periodical he found the designs of some patterns for goods. He thought he could copy them—did so—was eminently successful, and found that his three dollars was a most profitable investment. Had he said to the proffered magazine, as we have imagined the working man to say to our manual, "I have no need of thee," what a mistake he would have made!

7. The individual who follows no particular pursuit, will find a work most useful, which will enable him to pass his hours of retirement in entertaining improvement, and to maintain social intercourse with credit and esteem.

How often are the ignorant obliged to sit by in stupid silence, whilst those better informed are discussing the merits of English and American authors, of former or present days! How many there are who know nothing of English history excepting what they have learned from Shakspeare, and know no more of Shakspeare than they have witnessed on the stage! How many who confound Sir Isaac Newton with his namesake, the excellent Bishop, and do not know the difference between "rare Ben Jonson" and the dictator at Mrs. Thrale's!

LADIES are generally better informed than the other sex in these matters, but if the former would abridge toilet-reviews and inordinate indulgence in morning visits and evening parties, they would know more, though they might gossip less. A proper regard to the reputation of their own sex, should induce them to carefully peruse a volume which records the classic erudition of an Elizabeth Carter, the astronomical investigations of a Mary Somerville, the wisdom and piety of a Hannah More, the poetical genius of a Felicia Hemans, and other immortal trophies of female intellect, illustrated by a host of brilliant stars in the Literary Firmament.

8. All who purchase books for district and other school-libraries, for their own families or for their private book-cases, will see the usefulness of a work which will at once direct them to the BEST WORKS OF THE BEST AUTHORS. Teachers and parents will have no hesitation in accepting the critical opinions of the wise and good, recorded in these pages. As regards the work itself, care has been taken to rigorously exclude everything of an objectionable character. It may be read aloud to the family circle without fear of its calling a blush to the cheek of modesty, or inflicting a pang upon the heart of the conscientious Christian. It is proper in this connexion to remark, that whilst the literary merits of writers of all classes are candidly acknowledged, and no religious or irreligious peculiarities are considered as sanctioning injustice to their advocates, yet a profound deference to the principles of the Christian religion, and a settled disapprobation of the impieties and absurdities of infidelity, are fearlessly announced. If this displease any, let them be displeased. "Let God be true, and every man a liar."

9. Booksellers need not be told of the importance to their own interest, of encouraging the circulation of a work which will tend more to the enlarged sale of books than any publication which has ever appeared. Several of the best known and most extensive publishers and booksellers in the United States have warmly encouraged the preparation of this volume. Indeed, no intelligent bookseller who understands his own business, can dispense with it as a constant companion. It will enable him to point out to his customer, at once, the books of which he is in quest, and to show him the opinions of the most distinguished critics and esteemed authorities as to their merits or demerits. The application of these remarks, and many of the preceding considerations, to

AUTHORS and EDITORS, whether of books or periodicals, is so obvious, that no enlargement is necessary.

It is obvious to those at all familiar with the subject, that no work of this kind could have been properly prepared, without an intimate acquaintance with English literature, and the advantage of an extensive private library, for constant reference and consultation. It is, therefore, proper to remark, that the author of THE CRITICAL DICTIONARY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, AND BRITISH AND AMERICAN AUTHORS, has long applied himself to the subject, with considerable labour and zeal, and spent many years in accumulating a large collection of rare and curious literary treasures, in addition to the manuals generally considered as the best authorities. We give a list of some of the works which we have kept at our side for consultation and guidance, though not obliged to lay all of them under contribution.

The General Dictionary, Historical and Critical (including Bayle), of Birch, Lockman, Sale, and others. London, 1784-41, 10 vols., fol. The Biographia Britannica. Lon., 1747-86, 7 vols., fol.; and 1778-82, 5 vols., fol.

The English, Scotch, and Irish Historical Libraries, by Bishop Nicolson. Lon., 1776, 4to. Oldys's British Librarian. Lon., 1788, 12mo. Gerard Langbaine's Account of the English Dramatic Poets. Oxford, 1691, 18mo. Biographia Dramatica. Lon., 1812, 8 vols. in 4, 8vo. Whincop's Complete List of English Dramatic Poets. Lon., 1747, 8vo. Ritson's Bibliographia Poetica. 1802, R. 8vo. Wood's Athens Oxoniensis, with Additions and a Continuation by Dr. Bliss. Lon., 1818-20, 4 vols., 4to. Nichols's Literary Anecdotes. Lon., 1812-16, 10 vols. in 9, 8vo.; and Illustrations of the Literary History of the Eighteenth Century. 7 vols., 1817-48, 8vo. Walpole's History of the Royal and Noble Authors of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with a List of their Works, enlarged and continued by Thomas Park. Lon., 1806, 5 vols., 8vo.

Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica, or a General Index to British and Foreign Literature. Lon., 1824, 4 vols., 4to. To this excellent work we are largely indebted, having drawn freely from its pages for particulars of editions, &c. Some late writers have affected to depreciate the value of this work, because inaccuracies have not escaped the eye of the critic. Having examined every article pertaining to British authors (about 22,500) in the work, we consider ourselves qualified to give an opinion. Errors there are, and some glaring ones, which can readily be excused in a work of such vast compass, yet the Bibliotheca of Dr. Watt will always deserve to be valued as one of the most stupendous literary monuments ever reared by the industry of man. As stated elsewhere, we have included in our work every British author noticed by Dr. Watt; yet his work can by no means be dispensed with by the bibliographer. We continue our enumeration of authorities.

Dibdin's Typographical Antiquities; or The History of Printing in Great Britain, enlarged on Ames and Herbert. Lon., 1810-19, 4 vols., 4to. Dibdin's Bibliographical Decameron. Lon., 1817, 8 vols., 8vo. Dibdin's Library Companion. Lon., 1825, 8vo. Dibdin's Bibliomania, or Book Madness. 2d edit., Lon., 1842, R. 8vo. Dibdin's Greek and Roman Classics. 4th edit., Lon., 1827, 2 vols., imp. 8vo. Dibdin's Reminiscences of a Literary Life. Lon., 1836, 2 vols., 8vo. Dibdin's Director; a Literary Journal. Lon., 1807, 2 vols., 8vo.

Sir Egerton Brydges's (assisted by Haslewood and others) Censura Literaria, containing Titles, Abstracts, and Opinions of Old English Books, &c. 2d edit., Lon., 1815, 2 vols., 8vo.; The British Bibliographer, Lon., 1810-14, 4 vols., 8vo.; Restituta; or Titles, Extracts, and Characters of Old English Literature, revived, Lon., 1814-16, 4 vols., 8vo.; Brydges's edition of Phillips's Theatrum Poetarum Anglicanorum. Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne's Introduction to the Study of Bibliography. Lon., 1814, 2 vols., 8vo. Manual of Biblical Bibliography. Lon., 1839, 8vo. Bibliotheca Anglo-Poetica. Lon., 1815, R. 8vo. Schlosser's History of the 18th Century and part of the 19th, trans. by D. Davidson. Lon., 1844-52, 8 vols., 8vo. Dr. Drake's Shakspeare and his Times. Also the London Literary Gazette; London Athenæum; North British Review; Westminster Review; Edinburgh Annual Register; London Christian Observer; London Monthly Repository; British Magazine; London Notes and Queries; and a large collection of bibliography, including catalogues of many of the most celebrated English libraries, from Dr. Mede's to Dawson Turner's.

The reader will observe that only those works have been named which profess to record biographical or bibliographical information. It is hardly necessary to say, that in a city like Philadelphia, the author has not been restricted to his own library, for the purpose of literary research; although the above list, perhaps, evinces some zeal in the collection of appropriate works. It is, however, proper to state that the Critical Dictionary now submitted to the public, IS BY NO MEANS A MERE SERVILE COMPILATION FROM EXISTING AUTHORITIES. Great pains and much time have been devoted to the sifting of statements, the comparison of opposing records, and the authentication of dates.

The many errors to be found in compilations of this character, are partly attributable to the fact, that, in most instances, a number of editors, often without unity of counsel, have combined their labours in the production of one work. Yet the advantages of such combination in a compendium of general biography, are too great to be sacrificed to the hope of perhaps unattainable perfection. But it is believed that a work of the character now presented to the public, restricted to one class—authors—and British and American authors only, can be better prepared by one editor than by many. In such unions, each co-labourer brings to the common stock, preconceived partialities and antipathies, and a scientific or literary esprit du corps, which can hardly be reconciled without mutual concessions, and compromises, of which the public must bear the cost. That this is no picture of the imagination, the literary reader will bear us witness. In this work, the author has declined many proffers of assistance, in order that he might pursue his own plans without interruption, and feel, as he added stone after stone to the edifice, that the literary monument, when erected, would be the work of his own hands.

Whilst thus claiming all responsibility which attaches to the preparation of this volume, we have pleasure in expressing our obligations to the numerous correspondents in Great Britain and America who have furnished us information respecting their own literary biography or that of other writers. If we have not always profited by the well-meant suggestions of our advisers, it must be remembered in our defence that he alone who, from the advantages of his position, can take in at one survey the materials of which he is to compose his edifice, can intelligently judge as to the best disposition of the parts and the most suitable style of architecture.

With regard to those matters in which the author has been obliged to adjudicate—the opposing versions connected with biographical and literary details—he claims no infallibility, and must expect to encounter occasional dissent. Yet a timely caution against hasty and superficial criticism, may save mortification to that class of commentators who so often excite commiseration by mistaking crude speculations, and the rash confidence of unconscious ignorance, for the results of learned investigation, and the modest assurance of intelligent deliberation. When such critics feel disposed to charge us with error, from our want of coincidence with their preconceived opinions, it will be only modest to ask themselves, if it be quite certain that they are right, and ourselves in the wrong? Unless the disputed question be one within their own personal knowledge—which it, of course, seldom can be—their charge of error at our door, can only mean that they prefer some opposing version to that which they criticise;—but may not their authority have been the subject of our consideration, also?—have been carefully scrutinized, and deliberately rejected? We may not, indeed, explicitly refer to the dictum to which our critic so deferentially bows, for it is impossible in our limited space to give aught but the conclusions of our researches,—but this omission affords no proof of our ignorance of such opposing authorities. Whatever may be the faults and imperfections of our work, we prefer to fall into the hands of the learned, who can appreciate both merits and defects, rather than trust to the tender mercies of the literary charlatan, whose commendation and censure are alike worthless.

It is not the erudite bibliographer, for instance, who will object to the introduction into a work of this kind, of the many brief articles of a few lines—in some cases only one line—which will be found scattered up and down on our pages. Those who estimate the usefulness of an article by its length, would banish those short records from our volume; but the intelligent critic will reply, with Dr. Johnson, that all knowledge tends to profit, and that “it is of use to a man only to know that there is such a place as Kamschatka.”

The result of an important lawsuit, the adjustment of a disputed boundary, the settlement of a weighty literary controversy, may often depend upon the knowledge of the title, or date, of a book to be found in the conclusion of a “paltry line,” ridiculed by the ignorant for its brevity. And as regards the comparative value of information, each reader can judge for himself, but no one can prescribe for his fellow. The few lines devoted to the consideration of an antiquarian tract, which you grudge from the poetical article which precedes them, will be valued by some neighbouring “Oldbuck” above all the poetry since the days of Homer. Whilst to spread a repast which shall satisfy the appetite of all, is a consummation beyond the ambition even of a literary Lucullus, yet the author hopes that each guest will here find some refreshment which will reward him for his delay, and perhaps strengthen him anew for the journey of human life.

In conclusion, we would once more labour to impress upon our readers the duty of the zealous pursuit of those paths of learning and science which lead to usefulness, happiness, and honour. Be not dismayed by the apparently unattractive character of much of the scenery through which you must pass. Persevere; and distaste will soon yield to pleasure, and repugnance give place to enjoyment. An ever present and influential sense of the importance of the goal, will do wonders in overcoming the difficulties of the way. To those Israelites whose hearts fainted for a sight of their beloved Temple, the sands of the desert, and the perils of the road, presented no obstacles which their energy and their faith could not surmount. The arid “Valley of Baca” to them became a well—for, in the beautiful language of the Psalmist, “The rain also filleth the pools.”

TO THE READER.

It will be observed that the limit of the Literary History contained in this work is stated to be “The Middle of the Nineteenth Century.” Our pages, however, bear constant evidence of researches carried down to the day of publication; and in many cases we have felt at liberty to announce literary enterprises which may not see the light until long after our own labours have been submitted to the public.

1. As regards the places of publication of the works enumerated in this Dictionary, it will be understood that the place affixed to the first book noticed in an article applies also to all the books which occur before the mention of another place in the same article. There are some exceptions to this rule, (it is not known, for instance, where some books were printed,) but the bibliographer—the only one likely to be curious in such matters—will know where to look for the details which our limits forbid us to introduce.

2. It will be understood that the fact of the publication of Sermons properly suggests (in this Dictionary) the prefix Rev. to the name of the author, save in the few cases where such productions are from the pens of laymen,—which fact is always stated in the article.

3. At the end of the Dictionary the reader will find forty copious Indexes of subjects, by the means of which he can at once refer to all the authors who have written upon any given department of letters.

Introduction to Early English Literary History,

WITH

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLES OF PROMINENT AUTHORS AND THEIR WORKS,

FROM A.D. 500 TO A.D. 1850,

AND

Some Directions for a Course of English Reading.

READING is that art by which I am enabled to avail myself of the recorded wisdom of mankind.

As the results of Deliberation, the achievements of Enterprise, the conclusions of Judgment, and the excursions of Fancy, have, to a large extent, been recorded by the pen and diffused by the Press, each individual may profit by the labour of others, and, without diminishing the common stock, be enriched from the Public Treasury of Intellectual Wealth. We have already enlarged upon the duty of mental acquisition, and to this effect shown the necessity of careful selection, that we may not waste valuable time, which should be devoted to mental and moral improvement, in the perusal of that which is unprofitable, perhaps positively injurious, in its tendency. (See PREFACE.) So anxious are we to make a durable impression upon the mind of the reader, that we shall reinforce the arguments we have already urged to induce him to become a diligent student, by the citation of some weighty opinions as to the value of good books, and the inestimable rewards attendant upon literary research and intellectual cultivation.

That eccentric philosopher, ROBERT BURTON, after a review of the various devices which are used to exercise the "foul fiend," Melancholy, thus continues:

"But amongst those exercises, or recreations of the mind within doors, there is none so general, so aptly to be applied to all sorts of men, so fit and proper to expel idleness and melancholy, as that of STUDY: Studia senectutem oblectant, ad olecentiam alunt, secundas res ornant, adversis perfugium et solatium præbent, domi delectant, &c. [Study is the delight of old age, the support of youth, the ornament of prosperity, the solace and refuge of adversity, the comfort of domestic life, &c.]; and the rest in Tully pro Archia Poeta. . . . Who is he that is now wholly overcome with idleness, or otherwise involved in a labyrinth of worldly care, troubles, and discontents, that will not be much lightened in his mind by reading of some enticing story, true or feigned, where, as in a glass, he shall observe what our forefathers have done; the beginnings, ruins, falls, periods of commonwealths, private men's actions, displayed to the life, &c.? Plutarch therefore calls them, secundas menseas et bellaria, the second course and junkets, because they were usually read at noblemen's feasts. Who is not earnestly affected with a passionate speech, well penned, an elegant poem, or some pleasant bewitching discourse, like that of Heliodorus, ubi oblectatio quædam placida fuit, cum hilaritate conjuncta? Julian, the Apostate, was so taken with an oration of Libanius, the sophister, that, as he confesseth, he could not be quiet till he had read it all out. Legi orationem tuam magna ex parte, hesternæ die ante prandium, pransus vero sine ulla intermissione totam absolvi. O arguments! O compositionem! [I read a considerable part of your speech before dinner, but after I had dined I finished it completely. Oh what arguments, what eloquence!] To most kind of men it is an extraordinary delight to study. For what a world of books offers itself, in all subjects, arts and sciences, to the sweet consent and capacity of the reader! credi mihi (saith one) extingui dulce erit Mathematicarum artium studio, I could even live and die with such meditations, and take more delight, true content of mind in them, than thou hast in all thy wealth and sport, how rich soever thou art. . . . The like pleasure there is in all other studies, to such as are truly addicted to them; ea suavitatis (one holds) ut cum quis ea degustaverit, quasi poculis Circeis captus, non possit unquam ab illis divelli; the like sweetness, which as Circe's cup bewitcheth a student, he cannot leave off, as well may witness those many laborious hours, days and nights, spent in the voluminous treatises written by them; the same content. . . . Whoever he is therefore, that is overrun with solitariness, or carried away with pleasing melancholy and vain conceits, and for want of employment knows not how to spend his time, or crucified with worldly care, I can prescribe him no better remedy than this of study, to compose himself to the learning of some art or science. . . . So sweet is the delight of study, the more learning they have, the more they covet to learn, and the last day is prioris discipulus."

"If I were not a King, I would be a University man; and if it were so that I must be a prisoner, if I might have my wish, I would desire to have no other prison than that library, and to be chained together with so many good authors, et mortuis magister."—Speech of JAMES L. VESIT to the Bodleian Library, 1605.

"I no sooner come into the library, but I bolt the door to me, excluding lust, ambition, avarice, and melancholy herself, and in the very lap of eternity, amongst so many divine souls, I take my seat with so lofty a spirit and sweet content, that I pity all our great ones, and rich men that know not this happiness."—HENSIUS, Keeper of the Library at Leyden: Epist. Primiero. Vide BURTON's Anatomy of Melancholy.

The reader will find in D'ISRAELI's Curiosities of Literature an imitation of RANTAU's classical address to his books—Salvete aureoli mei libelli, &c.:

"Golden volumes! richest treasures!
Objects of delicious pleasures!
You my eyes rejoicing please,
You my hands in rapture seize!
Brilliant wits, and musing sages,
Lights who beam'd through many ages;
Left to your conscious leaves their story,
And dared to trust you with their glory;
And now their hope of fame achieved,
Dear volumes! you have not deceived!"

The friends of the recluse of Vaucluse apologized to him for the length of time between their visits:

"It is impossible for us to follow your example: the life you lead is contrary to human nature. In winter, you sit like an owl, in the chimney corner. In summer, you are running incessantly about the fields."

PETRARCH smiled at these observations:

"These people," said he, "consider the pleasures of the world as the supreme good, and cannot bear the idea of renouncing them. I have FRIENDS, whose society is extremely agreeable to me: they are of all ages, and of every country. They have distinguished themselves both in the cabinet and in the field, and obtained high honours for their knowledge of the sciences. It is easy to gain access to them; for they are always at my service, and I admit them to my company, and dismiss them from it, whenever I please. They are never troublesome, but immediately answer every question I ask them. Some relate to me the events of past ages, while others reveal to me the secrets of nature. Some teach me how to live, and others how to die. Some, by their vivacity, drive away my cares and exhilarate my spirits, while others give fortitude to my mind, and teach me the important lesson how to restrain my desires, and to depend wholly on myself. They open to me, in short, the various avenues of all the arts and sciences, and upon their information I safely rely, in all emergencies. In return for all these services, they only ask me to accommodate them with a convenient chamber in some corner of my humble habitation, where they may repose in peace: for these friends are more delighted by the tranquillity of retirement, than with the tumults of society."

Is not this an exquisite picture of the mine of boundless wealth, of the unfailing luxurious repast, which that man possesses who has a taste for Reading and Study?

"Books look on as to their Readers or Authors, do at the very first mention, challenge Preheminence above the Worlds admired fine things. Books are the Glasse of Counsell to dress ourselves by. They are lifes best business: Vocation to these hath more Emolument coming in, than all the other busie Termes of life. They are Feelesse Counsellours, no delaying Patrons, of easie Access, and kind Expedition, never sending away empty any Client or Petitioner. They are for Company, the best Friends; in doubt, Counsellours; in Damp, Comforters; Time's Perspective; the home Traveller's Ship, or Horse, the busie man's best Recreation, the Opiate of Idle weariness; the mind's best Ordinary; Nature's Garden and Seed-plot of Immortality. Time spent (needlessly) from them, is consumed, but with them, twice gain'd. Time captivated and snatched from thee, by Incursions of business, Thefts of Visitants, or by thy own Carelesnesse lost, is by these, redeemed in life; they are the soul's Viaticum; and against death its Cordiall. In a true verdict, no such Treasure as a Library."

Good old Bishop HALL is eloquent on the same theme:

MEDITATION ON THE SIGHT OF A LARGE LIBRARY.

"What a world of thought is here packed up together! I know not whether this sight doth more dismay, or comfort me. It dismays me to think that here is so much that I cannot know; it comforts me to think that this variety affords so much assistance to know what I should. . . . What a happiness is it, that without the aid of necromancy, I can here call up any of the ancient worthies of learning, whether human or divine, and confer with them upon all my doubts; that I can at pleasure summon whole synods of reverend fathers and acute doctors from all the coasts of the earth, to give their well-studied judgments in all doubtful points which I propose. Nor can I cast my eye casually upon any of these silent masters, but I must learn somewhat. It is a wantonness to complain of choice. No law binds us to read all; but the more we can take in and digest, the greater will be our improvement."

"Blessed be God, who hath set up so many clear lamps in his church; none but the wilfully blind can plead darkness. And blessed be the memory of those, his faithful servants, who have left their blood, their spirits, their lives in these precious papers; and have willingly wasted themselves into these enduring monuments to give light to others."

"Books, as Dryden has aptly termed them, are spectacles to read Nature. Echylus and Aristotle, Shakspeare, and Bacon, are Priests who preach and expound the mysteries of Man and the Universe. They teach us to understand and feel what we see, to decipher and syllable the hieroglyphics of the senses."—HARRIS.

The advice of Lord BACON to Chief Justice Coke should be pondered by every one desirous of mental improvement:

"For Friends, although your Lordship be scant, yet I hope you are not altogether destitute; if you be, do but look upon good Books: they are true Friends, that will neither flatter nor dissemble: be you but true to yourself, applying that which they teach unto the party grieved, and you shall need no other comfort nor counsel. To them, and to God's Holy Spirit directing you in the reading of them, I commend your Lordship."

"Let us consider how great a commodity of doctrine exists in books; how easily, how secretly, how safely they expose the nakedness of human ignorance, without putting it to shame. These are the masters who instruct us without rods and ferrules, without hard words and anger, without clothes or money. If you approach them, they are not asleep; if investigating you interrogate them, they conceal nothing; if you mistake them, they never grumble; if you are ignorant, they cannot laugh at you."—RICHARD DE BURY: Philobiblon.

"Books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them, to be as active as that soul was, whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve, as in a vial, the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively and as vigorously productive as those fabulous dragon's teeth; and, being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. As good almost to kill a man, as kill a good book: who kills a man, kills a reasonable creature—God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself—kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master-spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life."—JOHN MILTON.

"Here is the best solitary company in the world, and in this particular, chiefly excelling any other, that in my study I am sure to converse with none but wise men; but abroad it is impossible for me to avoid the society of fools. What an advantage have I, by this good fellowship, that, besides the help which I receive from hence, in reference to my life after this life, I can enjoy the life of so many ages before I lived! That I can be acquainted with the passages of three or four thousand years ago, as if they were the weekly occurrences. Here, without travelling so far as Endor, I can call up the ablest spirits of those times, the learnedest philosophers, the wisest counsellors, the greatest generals, and make them serviceable to me. I can make bold with the best jewels they have in their treasury, with the same freedom that the Israelites borrowed of the Egyptians, and, without suspicion of felony, make use of them as mine own."—SIR WILLIAM WALLER: Meditation upon the Contentment I have in my Books and Study.

"That place that does Contain my books, the best companions, is
To me a glorious court, where hourly I
Converse with the old sages and philosophers;
And sometimes for variety, I confer
With kings and emperors, and weigh their counsels,
Calling their victories, if unjustly got,
Unto a strict account; and in my fancy,
Deface their ill-placed statues. Can I then Part with such constant pleasures, to embrace
Uncertain vanities? No: be it your care
To augment a heap of wealth; it shall be mine
To increase in knowledge." FLETCHER.

"Books should to one of these four ends conduce,
For wisdom, piety, delight, or use." DENHAM.

"To divert, at any time, a troublesome fancy, run to thy Books. They presently fix thee to them, and drive the other out of thy thoughts. They always receive thee with the same kindness."—FULLER.

"It is manifest that all government of action is to be gotten by knowledge, and knowledge, best, by gathering many knowledges, which is READING."—SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

"Education begins the gentleman, but READING, good company, and reflection, must finish him."—LOCKE.

"Books are part of man's prerogative;
In formal ink they thought and voices hold,
That we to them our solitude may give,
And make time present travel that of old.
Our life, Fame pieceth longer at the end,
And Books it farther backward doth extend."

SIR THOMAS OVERBURY.

"Knowledge of Books in a man of business, is as a torch in the hands of one who is willing and able to show those who are bewildered the way which leads to prosperity and welfare."—Spectator.

"Like friends, we should return to Books again and again; for, like true friends, they will never fail us,—never cease to instruct,—never cloy."—Joineriana.

"Books are standing counsellors and preachers, always at hand, and always disinterested; having this advantage over oral instructors, that they are ready to repeat their lesson as often as we please."—ARON.

"In England, where there are as many new books published, as in all the rest of Europe put together, a spirit of freedom and reason reigns among the people; they have been often known to act like fools, they are generally found to think like men. . . . An author may be considered as a merciful substitute to the legislature. He acts not by punishing crimes, but by preventing them."—GOLDSMITH.

"Next to acquiring good friends, the best acquisition is that of good books."—COLTON.

"Young men should not be discouraged from buying books: much may depend upon it. It is said of Whiston, that the accidental purchase of Tacquet's own Euclid at an auction, first occasioned his application to mathematical studies."—Biography of Whiston.

"The foundation of knowledge must be laid by reading. General principles must be had from books; which, however, must be brought to the test of real life. In conversation, you never get a system. What is said upon a subject, is to be gathered from a hundred people. The parts which a man gets thus, are at such a distance from each other, that he never attains to a full view."—DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

"Books are men of higher stature,
And the only men that speak aloud for future times to hear."
ELIZABETH B. BARRETT.

"The past but lives in words; a thousand ages
Were blank, if books had not evoked their ghosts.
And kept the pale unbodied shades to warn us
From fleshless lips." E. L. BULWER.

"It is books that teach us to refine our pleasures when young, and which, having so taught us, enable us to recall them with satisfaction when old."—LEIGH HUNT.

"Were I to pray for a taste which should stand me in stead under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me during life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss, and the world frown upon me, it would be A TASTE FOR READING. Give a man this taste, and the means of gratifying it, and you can hardly fail of making him a happy man; unless, indeed, you put into his hands a most perverse selection of Books. You place him in contact with the best society in every period of history,—with the wisest, the wittyest, the tenderest, the bravest, and the purest characters who have adorned humanity. You make him a denizen of all nations, a contemporary of all ages. The world has been created for him!"—SIR JOHN HERSCHEL: Address at the Opening of the Eton Library, 1833.

"In the best Books great men talk to us, with us, and give us their most precious thoughts. Books are the voices of the distant and the dead. Books are the true levellers. They give to all who will faithfully use them, the society and the presence of the best and greatest of our race. No matter how poor I am; no matter, though the prosperous of my own time will not enter my obscure dwelling; if LEARNED MEN AND POETS will enter and take up their abode under my roof—if MILTON will cross my threshold to sing to me of Paradise; and SHAKESPEARE open to me the worlds of imagination, and the workings of the human heart; and FRANKLIN enrich me with his practical wisdom, —I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man, though excluded from what is called the best society in the place where I live. . . . I know how hard it is to some men, especially to those who spend much time in manual labour, to fix attention on Books. Let them strive to overcome the difficulty, by choosing subjects of deep interest, or by reading in company with those they love. Nothing can supply the place of Books. They are cheering or soothing companions in solitude, illness, affliction. The wealth of both continents would not compensate for the good they impart. Let every man, if possible, gather some good Books under his roof, and obtain access for himself and family to some social Library. Almost any luxury should be sacrificed to this.—WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING: Self-Culture.

"If the crowns of all the kingdoms of Europe were laid down at my feet in exchange for my Books and my love of Reading, I would spurn them all."—ARCHBISHOP FENELON.

"A taste for Books is the pleasure and glory of my life. I would not exchange it for the glory of the Indies."—EDWARD GIBBON.

And now, gentle reader, having evoked so many of the "mighty and the noble," who, gathering around thee, a "cloud of witnesses," have sought to stimulate thy ambition by pointing to the "ample page of knowledge, rich with the spoils of time," let me hope that a spirit hath been aroused within thee which will induce thee to enter in and possess the wealth of the land: a goodly heritage is before thee; and like the chosen people of old, thou shalt be enriched by the labours of thy predecessors, and rejoice in abundance of good.

But if thy heart tells thee that thou hast no taste for these delights, if thou still preferrest sensuous pleasures, if "divine philosophy, though musical as is Apollo's lute," be harsh and crabbed to thy apprehension, and the harp and the viol of earthly banquets allure thee, and thou be of those who "rejoice at the sound of the organ," the ceremonies of bravery and the trappings of courts, "the pomp of heraldry and the boast of power," put by this volume, and go thy way. Thy stolidity is impregnable; array thyself with the cap and bells, and engage thy passage in Barclay's Shyp of Foys (q. nom.): thy "talk is of bullocks," and of such the Son of Sirach says:

"They shall not be sought for in public council, nor sit high in the congregation: they shall not sit on the judges' seat, nor understand the sentence of the judgment: they cannot declare justice and judgment; and they shall not be found where parables are spoken. . . . All their desire is in the work of their craft."

The History of England, as connected with a review of English Literature, may be divided into six terms.

1. The British Period: from the earliest times to the Roman Invasion, B. C. 55.
2. The Roman Period, B. C. 55, A. D. 449.
3. The Anglo-Saxon Period, A. D. 449, A. D. 1066.
4. The Anglo-Norman Period: from the invasion of William the Conqueror, A. D. 1066, to the accession of Henry the Third, A. D. 1216.
5. From the accession of Henry III., A. D. 1216, to the accession of Elizabeth, A. D. 1558.
6. From the accession of Elizabeth, A. D. 1558, to the middle of the nineteenth century.

In this division we have not adhered to the classification of some preceding writers, but we trust that we have not innovated without sufficient excuse. The death of Stephen de Langton, in 1228, coincides so nearly with the accession of Henry III. in 1216, that the synchronism offers a convenient boundary for the Anglo-Norman period. The reign of Henry III. is likewise historically memorable as that which witnessed the shooting forth of that feeble germ (the popular element) which has now become so great a tree, that the Throne and the Altar, which once obstructed its growth, now repose only in safety under its branches.

The advent of the English doctrinal Reformation cannot well be dated before the accession of Elizabeth, and the literary lustre of that reign affords a strong argument for its being adopted as a boundary between the servility of the Latin period, and the vigorous adolescence of the English tongue. We need hardly explain that we use these terms respectively, in a chronological and philological acceptation, without any reference to the intellectual calibre of the writers of these epochs.

In the earliest times of which we have any record, we find the Celts, Cymry, Welsh, or Britons, the inhabitants of the British isles. The origin of the early population is involved in obscurity. The theory propounded by the Welsh priest, Tysilio, in the seventh century, and gravely alleged by Edward I., in his letter to Boniface, in the fourteenth,—that the inhabitants of the southern part of Britain were descended from the Trojans,—is now generally discredited by antiquaries. Of conjectures, of course, there is no end; and we have Aylett Sammes, contending for the Phœnician origin of the first colonizers of Britain and Ireland; Sir William Betham, who insists upon awarding the priority of occupation to the Picts, or Cimbri of antiquity, and many other theories as ingenious as they are incapable of demonstration.

Of the language of this people we know but little:

"Though the Britains or Welch were the first possessors of this island whose names are recorded, and are therefore in civil history always considered as the predecessors of the present inhabitants; yet the deduction of the English language, from the earliest times of which we have any knowledge, to its present state, requires no mention of them: for we have so few words which can, with any probability, be referred to British roots, that we justly regard the Saxons and Welch, as nations totally distinct."—DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

"The language of Britain differed very little from that of the Gaul. Some of the British tribes seem to have come from Celtic, and others from Belgic, Gaul; but it is probable, as indeed Strabo distinctly assures us, that the Celts and the Belgians spoke merely two slightly differing dialects of the same tongue. The evidence of the most ancient names of localities throughout the whole of South Britain confirms this account; everywhere these names appear to belong to one language, and that the same which is still spoken by the native Irish, and the Scotch Highlanders; the latter of whom call themselves, to this day, Gaels or Gauls."—History of England.

The English language is a branch of the Teutonic, or Gothic, which is the mother-tongue of many dialects now prevailing in several of the countries of Europe. Dr. Hickes gives the following genealogical table:

GOTHIC.

Anglo-Saxon, Dutch, Frisick, English,	Francick, German,	Cimbrick, Islandick, Norwegian, Swedish, Danish.

"What was the form of the Saxon language when, about the year 450, they first entered Britain, cannot now be known. They seem to have been a people without learning, and very probably without an alphabet; their speech, therefore, having been always cursory and extemporaneous, must have been artless and unconnected, without any modes of transition or involution of clauses; which abruptness and inconnection may be observed even in their later writings. This barbarity may be supposed to have continued during their wars with the Britains, which for a time left them no leisure for softer studies; nor is there any reason for supposing it abated till the year 570, when Augustine came from Rome to convert them to Christianity. The Christian religion always implies or produces a certain degree of civility and learning; they then became by degrees acquainted with the Roman language, and so gained, from time to time, some knowledge and elegance, till in three centuries they had formed a language capable of expressing all the sentiments of a civilized people, as appears by King Alfred's paraphrase in imitation of Boethius, and his short preface, which I have selected as the first specimen of ancient English."—DR. SAMUEL JOHNSON.

About 1150, the Saxon began to take the form which was gradually moulded to the proportions of the modern English, though not without a most important admixture of other elements. After the Norman conquest, many Saxon words became obsolete, and Latin and French shoots were from time to time grafted upon the present stock, until in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it began to assume the form of modern English. Yet Gower and Chaucer are more of a task than a pleasure to the ordinary English reader.

"Nothing can be more difficult than to determine, except by an arbitrary line, the commencement of the English language; not so much, as in those of the continent, because we are in want of materials, but rather from an opposite reason—the possibility of tracing a very gradual accession of verbal changes that ended in a change of denomination. For when we compare the earliest English of the thirteenth century with the Anglo-Saxon of the twelfth, it seems hard to pronounce why it should pass for a separate language, rather than a modification or simplification of the former. We must conform, however, to usage, and say that the Anglo-Saxon was converted into English—1, by contracting, or otherwise modifying, the pronunciation and orthography of words; 2, by omitting many inflections, especially of the noun, and consequently making more use of articles and auxiliaries; 3, by the introduction of French derivations; 4, by using less inversion and ellipsis, especially in poetry. Of these, the second alone, I think, can be considered as sufficient to describe a new form of language; and this was brought about so gradually, that we are not relieved of much of our difficulty, whether some compositions shall pass for the latest offspring of the mother, or the earliest fruit of the fertility of the daughter."—HALLAM.

That eminent philologist, Dr. WEBSTER, has been taken to task for asserting at the conclusion of some quotations from the Laws of Kings Æthelbert and Eadgar, that "we observe by these extracts that rather more than half the Saxon words have been lost, and now form no part of our language."

The Dr. subsequently remarks:

"Mr. Meidinger of Frankfort, in the Introduction to his Etymological and Comparative Dictionary of the Teuto-Gothic Languages, notices this observation of mine, respecting the proportion of Saxon words which have been lost, and then states the opinion of Mr. Turner, that more than four-fifths of the words in modern English are of Saxon origin. This difference in the two statements proceeds from a circumstance overlooked. My statement refers only to the actual proportion of Saxon words retained in the vocabulary, which is probably less than half of the whole number of words in the language. Mr. Turner's statement refers to the proportion of Saxon words actually used in our common language, which is, doubtless, as great as he represents it. The words of Saxon origin are the more necessary words; such as are wanted in all the common concerns of life; and therefore in use they compose the body of the language."—Introduction to Webster's English Dictionary.

It will be observed that we do not profess to enter into the learning of philological investigation, or to discuss the many modern dissertations upon this interesting department of study. Such a departure from our plan would be altogether unjustifiable. The reader who desires to pursue this subject will find valuable guides in the prefaces and introductions to JOHNSON'S, WEBSTER'S, and RICHARDSON'S Dictionaries, and in the works of LYN, BOSWORTH, THORPE, PEGGE, PAYNE, CLARK, WELSFORD, HARRISON, LATHEAM, SAVAGE, MACLEAN, MARCET, &c.

Having taken a hasty review of the language, we now proceed to the examination of the literature of our ancestors.

The first two periods of our classification—the British and the Roman—afford nothing to arrest our attention:

"Whatever existed in those remote times deserving the name of learning or scientific knowledge, never having been committed to writing, and having consequently perished with the general subversion of the order of things then established, cannot be regarded as having been even the beginning or rudimental germ of that which we now possess. The present literary civilization of England dates its commencement only from the Saxon period, and not from a very early point in that."

The first name in the catalogue of Anglo-Saxon writers is that of GILDAS, said by William of Malmesbury and Johannes Glastoniensis, to have died A.D. 512, which early date is inconsistent with other statements in which his name occurs. Gildas is represented to have been a zealous missionary, the son of Cam or Ken, a British king, who reigned in the district of Alcluyd, (Dumbarton.) To this writer, is ascribed, by Bede, a tract (in Latin) on British History under the Romans, and during the Saxon invasion, &c. This work de Excidio Britannicæ is chiefly compiled from Roman writers. Giraldus Cambrensis mentions the epigrams of Gildas; and Geoffrey of Monmouth, John Brompton, and Bale, ascribe theological and other treatises to this author. So far as we removed from certainty on these questions, that whilst some contend for two of the name, others deny that Gildas is any thing more than a fabulous personage.

We may remark, in pursuing our subject, that it will be unnecessary for us to enter here into any historical details of the writers we shall mention; as those of any importance will be treated of in the body of this work.

The reader should carefully peruse the Biographia Britannica Literaria, Anglo-Saxon Period, 1 vol., Lon., 1842; Anglo-Norman Period, 1 vol., Lon., 1846, by that eminent scholar, Thomas Wright, A. M., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France, (Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres), published under the superintendence of the Council of the Royal Society of Literature. To these works we have been largely indebted for our notices of the writers of this early age, and have had so much confidence in Mr. Wright's accuracy, that we have incorporated large portions of his sketches of eminent authors, as Bede, Alfred, Neckham, &c., into our work, without notice of other authorities upon the same subjects. This is the only case in which we have so closely followed our authority; of course credit has been given to Mr. Wright at the conclusion of the articles, for the matter thus borrowed. We shall increase our obligations to this learned gentleman by presenting the reader with the following tables of the writers of the Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman periods, extracted from the Biog. Brit. Lit. :

The following remarks are interesting in this connection:

"The poetry of the Anglo-Saxons was neither modulated according to foot-measure, like that of the Greeks and Romans, nor written with rhymes, like that of many modern languages. Its chief and universal characteristic was a very regular alliteration, so arranged that, in every couplet there should be two principal words in the first line beginning with the same letter, which letter must also be the initial of the first word on which the stress of the voice falls in the second line. The only approach to a metrical system yet discovered is that two risings and two fallings of the voice seem necessary to each perfect line. Two distinct measures are met with, a shorter and a longer, both commonly mixed together in the same poem, the former being used for the ordinary narrative, and the latter adopted when the poet sought after greater dignity. In the manuscripts, the Saxon poetry is always written continuously like prose, perhaps for the sake of convenience, but the division of the lines is generally marked by a point.

"The popular literature of the Normans in France and England previous to the twelfth century is totally unknown to us. . . . However, as most of the popular literature of this period was confined to the jongleurs, who were at the same time authors and minstrels, and as it was probably seldom or never committed to writing, we have no difficulty in accounting for its loss. We know that there were jongleurs in Normandy at an early period, and that they followed their patrons to England. But we only become acquainted with their compositions at a later period. In literature, the Anglo-Norman language first makes its appearance in poems of a religious and serious character; and it seems to have first found a distinguished patron in Adelaide of Louvaine, queen of Henry I. . . . Most of this religious and serious poetry consisted in mere translations or paraphrases from the Latin, and the writers make no further pretension. . . . The only known English writers of Anglo-Saxon prose are Walter Mapes, Robert de Borron, and Luces de Gast, the authors of some of the most popular romances of the cycle of the Round Table. . . . It will be seen by this brief review of the literature of the Anglo-Norman language during the twelfth century, that, until the close of the century, it has no great attraction beyond a few historical productions which might as well have been written in Latin, and one or two metrical romances. . . . It would be in vain to attempt a history of English literature in the twelfth century, because every thing connected with it is vague and uncertain."—See Introduction to Biog. Brit. Lit.

The reader will refer to the articles, CÆDMON, the monk (died about 680); BEDE (died 735); King ALFRED (died 901); ALFRIC of Canterbury (died 1006); CYNEW, Bishop of Winchester (died 1008); WULFSTAN, Bishop of Worcester, Archbishop of York (died 1023), &c.—for notices of some of the principal writers from the death of Gildas to the termination of the Saxon Chronicle.

The Saxon Chronicle, the production of a number of authors, professes to give a history of English affairs from A. D. 1-1150, at which date it abruptly concluded.

About 1180? we have Layamon's metrical translation of the Brut d'Angleterre, of Wace, written about 1160, and itself a translation from Geoffrey of Monmouth. This ingenious monk obliges us with a history of British occurrences from Brutus of Troy, who is placed long before the Christian era, to Cadwallader, A. D. 689. Layamon seems to know the original history only through the version of Maister Wace. Upon the same history principally, is founded the Chronicle of Robert of Gloucester, (temp. Henry III. and Edward I.) who professes to narrate the history of England from the time of Brutus to the death of Sir Henry of Almaine.

"The orations with which he occasionally diversifies the thread of his story, are, in general, appropriate and dramatic, and not only prove his good sense, but exhibit no unfavourable specimens of his eloquence. In his description of the first crusade, he seems to change his usual character, and becomes not only entertaining, but even animated."—ELLIS.

This Chronicle consists of more than ten thousand lines, and ⁴¹1444 drines at that! The Bodleian, Cottonian, and Harleian MSS. of it are considered the best. There is also one in the Library of the Herald's College.

The next of the Rhyming Chronicles is Robert Manning, or Robert de Brunne, (temp. Edward I. and II.) the translator of Manuel des Pêches and Peter de Langtoft's Chronicle. This verse is shorter than that of Robert of Gloucester, approaching the octosyllabic stanza of a later period.

The reader will find some specimens of the changes of language in the periods which have now been referred to in an excellent work accessible to all—W. & R. Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature. Some valuable dissertations in the introductions to Shaw's and Spalding's Histories of English Literature should also be carefully perused. For a history of the English Metrical Romances, the period of which we may assume to be 1300–1500, Warton's History of English Poetry, and Halliwell's and Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, should be consulted. The literature of this character was almost exclusively composed of versions from French originals. The theory of Sir Walter Scott respecting Sir Tristram, and Mr. Warton's ascription of The Life of Alexander the Great to Adam Davie, are perhaps hardly tenable in the present day. Among the best known compositions of this period may be mentioned, SIR GUY, THE SQUIRE OF LOW DEGREE, SIR DEGORE, KING ROBERT OF SICILY, THE KING OF TARS, IMPOMEDON, LA MORT ARTUR, SIR THOPAS, SIR BEVIS, SIR ISENBRAAS, SIR LIBIUS, and GAWAN AND GALOGRAAS. Let the reader carefully peruse Ellis's Historical Introduction on the Rise and Progress of Romantic Composition in France and England; prefixed to the Specimens of Early English Metrical Romances. Of this valuable work a new edition has been published, under the editorial care of the eminent antiquary, philologist, and enthusiastic philomath, J. Orchard Halliwell, Esq., F. R. S. (Bohn's Antiquarian Library, Lon., 1848: also procure The Chronicles of the Crusades; indeed all of the volumes of this valuable series should be in the hands of the curious student.)

The following remarks are not without interest in this connection:

"That a class of men who cultivated the arts of amusement as a profession, were known and esteemed by the Normans of the time of the Conquest, is undeniably proved by the evidence of Domesday-book; in which we find a certain Bedric possessed of a large tract of land in Gloucestershire, under the title of joculator regis. The register, of course, does not explain the talents of this jocular, or jongleur; but it may be fairly assumed that they were similar to those of the minstrel Taillefer, who, as Wace informs us, 'moult bien chantent,' and who preceded the Duke of Normandy at the battle of Hastings, 'singing about Charlemagne, and Rollo, and Olivier, and the vassals who died at Roncesvalles.' We are further informed by Gaimar, that he performed many marvellous feats of dexterity: throwing his lance into the air as if it were a small stick; catching it by the point before he cast it against the enemy; and repeating the same operation with his sword, so that they who beheld him considered him as a conjuror—

L'un dit à l'autre ki coveit,
Ke eo esteit enchantement,
Ke cil faisait devant la gent,
Quant, &c.

Now, unless it could be proved that the Normans adopted the profession of minstrelsy from the French, of which there is no evidence, it must follow that they carried it with them from Denmark; and as Bishop Peffy has shown that a character nearly analogous existed among the Danes, as well as the Anglo-Saxons the derivation of the minstrels from the Scalds and Glee-men of the North, as established in the Essay prefixed to the 'Reliques of Ancient Poetry,' seems to rest upon as fair historical testimony as can be required in confirmation of such an opinion."—Introduction to the Rise and Progress of Romantic Composition, &c.; also peruse the Essay prefixed to Percy's Reliques.

About the middle of the thirteenth century, the application of poetry—heretofore confined to, 1. Chronicles, 2. Romances—to general subjects, manners, morals, descriptive essays, &c., came into use. The reader must procure for a view of the essays of this period, Mr. Thomas Wright's Political Songs and Specimens of Lyric Poetry, composed in England in the reign of Edward I.: Reliquiæ Antiquæ, 2 vols. Laurence Minot, in secular, and Richard Rolle, in theological poetry, are two of the prominent names of the fourteenth century. About 1360 was completed the Vision of Piers Plowman, the composition of a secular priest named Robert Langlande. The poet sets forth by allegorical representations the corruptions prevailing among the ecclesiastics, and predicts a severe punishment as the consequences of such disorder. We have in this singular allegory the characters of Mercy, Truth, Conscience, Pride, Sir In-witt, See-well, Say-well, Hear-well, Work-well, Go-well, &c. The reader will not be surprised that such similarity of characters has led some critics to compare this ancient poem with the Pilgrim's Progress.

It was about this period, say 1350, that the character styled Black-Letter, or Old English, was first used.

We have now reached a most important landmark, at which we may properly conclude our synopsis—the name of the Great Father of English Poetry, GEOFFREY CHAUCER, born between 1328 and 1346. We need hardly remark that the inscription on his tomb, stating him to have died in the year 1400, at the age of 72, is not based upon any known authority, having been placed where it is, about 150 years after his death. However, these are matters which are discussed in the following pages, and therefore biographical details respecting individuals, and bibliographical and critical information regarding their works, will not be expected here. We may now appropriately introduce from the tables in the Companion to the British Almanac, as improved in George P. Putnam's World's Progress, New York, 1851, a Chronological Table of some of the principal British Authors and their works, A. D. 500–1850.

The following may be named as among the best manuals in the department of History, Divinity, Moral and Political Philosophy, Voyages, and Travels.

I. The History of England. Our favourite history is the "Pictorial," published by Messrs. Charles Knight & Co., 11 vols., with Index vol., imp. 8vo., 1849-50; from B. C. 55 to A. D. 1846.

We have given our opinion as to the merits of this compilation, when treating of the works of J. Petit Andrews, (q. v.)

As regards earlier histories, Hall's History of the Houses of York and Lancaster, Leland's English Antiquities, Cavendish's Life of Wolsey, Hollingshed's Chronicles, Buchanan's History of Scotland, Stowe's Chronicles, Camden's Britannia and Reign of Elizabeth and James I., Daniel's History of England, Speed's History of Great Britain, Hayward's English History, Spelman's Antiquities, Lord Bacon's Henry VII., Lord Herbert's Life of Henry VIII., Fuller's Church History and Worthies of England, and Baker's Chronicles afford sufficient materials to the most enthusiastic lover of historic lore.

For the occurrences of the memorable days of the Commonwealth, we have Harris's Charles I. and Cromwell, Neal's History of the Puritans, Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, May's History of Parliament, and the works of Whitlocke, Hutchinson, Prynn, Holles, Ludlow, &c. If we wish to see how those subjects have been treated by modern writers, we have Hume and Catherine Macaulay as the apologists of the Stuarts and of the Republicans, respectively, and the works of Godwin, Foster, and Carlyle. The following historical works should be carefully read: Burnet's Own Times, Hearne's History and Antiquities, Strype's Ecclesiastical History, Echard's History of England, the mine of curious erudition in Carte's History of England, and the Life of the Duke of Ormonde,—Granger's Biographical History of England, Keightley's History of England, Sir James Mackintosh's History of the Revolution of 1688, Hallam's Constitutional History, Miller's George III., Croly's George IV., Mr. Macaulay's Commencement of the History of England from the Accession of James II., and Smyth's Lectures on Modern History.

For a knowledge of the History of America, the reader should consult Robertson's America, Botta's Revolution, Irving's History of Columbus and his Followers, Prescott's Conquest of Mexico, and Conquest of Peru, Burke's European Settlements in N. America, and his Speeches on America. Grahame's, Hildreth's, and Bancroft's History of the United States, Sparks's Life and Writings of Washington, Franklin, and Morris, Sparks's American Biography, first and second series, Ramsay's Life of Washington, American Revolution, Marshall's Life of Washington, Washington Irving's ditto, Holmes's Annals of America, Flint's History of Mississippi Valley, Theodore Irving's Conquests of Florida, and the works of John Adams, Hamilton, John Jay, John Q. Adams, Jefferson, Calhoun, Benton, Webster, Colton's Life of Clay, the papers in the Federalist, Davis's Life of Burr, &c. The works of Catlin and McKenney, Hall and Schoolcraft, on the North American Indians, should not be neglected.

The History of British India will be found in the works of Orme, Cambridge, Mills, Martin, Malcolm's Life of Clive, Gleig's Memoirs of Hastings, the trial of Warren Hastings in the works of Burke, &c.

II. Among Commentators upon the Holy Scriptures, may be mentioned Doddridge, Patrik, Lowth, Whitby, Macknight, D'Oyly, Mant, Henry, Gill, Scott, Clarke, Burkitt, Robinson, Home, Barnes, Addison, Alexander, Turner, Bush, and the valuable manuals of Biblical Bibliography of Horne, Orme, Williams, and Bickersteth. The English language is exceedingly rich in sterling divinity. Of these it may be sufficient to mention Taylor, Hooker, Chillingworth, Mede, Barrow, Pearson, Usher, Hall, Penn, Barclay, Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Bull, Waterland, Clarke, Sherlock, Warburton, Secker, Jortin, Lowth, Leslie, Owen, Hammond, Leland, Lardner, Doddridge, Watts, Latimer, Edgeworth, Seed, South, Sherlock, Porteus, Horsley, Paley, Edwards, Dwight, Gisborne, Robert Hall, Forster, Chalmers, and Jay.

III. Among Manuals of Devotion, will be found the Holy Living and Dying of Jeremy Taylor, Private Thoughts of Bishop Beveridge, Reflections on the Holy Spirit by Allix, Scott's Christian Life, Nelson's Fasts and Festivals, the Whole Duty of Man, the Ladies' Calling, and the Companions to the Prayer Book by Cumber, Wheatley, and Sparrow. Jenks, Bean, Cotteril, Blomfield, Hicks, Downington, Jay, and others, also published works upon this most important branch of literature.

IV. In Voyages and Travels, the voluminous collections of Pinkerton, Hakluyt, Kerr, and Porter, and the narratives of Humboldt, Warburton, Hall, Lyell, Beckford, Hobhouse, Valentia, Barrow, Murray, Gardiner, Davis, Gutzlaff, Langdon, Russell, Kohl, Laing, Howitt, Heber, Head, Combe, Buckingham, Martineau, Frazer, Gray, Egerton, Fellowes, Rennell, Layard, Kinnear, Long, Burnes, Buck, Robinson, Cramer, Lindsay, Wilson, Wordsworth, Eustace, Stephens, Bayard Taylor, Frémont, Wilkes, Kane, Lynch, and others, will serve to profitably beguile many a long winter evening. See Pycroft's Course of English Reading, and Dibdin's Library Companion.

V. In Moral Philosophy, Paley has been highly commended; but his theory of expediency is radically unsound. Dymond's Elements of Christian Morality we consider the best work of the kind in the language. Chalmers's Bridgewater Treatise, Mackintosh's Dissertation on the Study of Ethical Philosophy, Beattie's Principles of Moral Science, Abercrombie's Philosophy of the Moral Feelings, Butler's Works, Foster's Essays on Decision of Character, Mason on Self-Knowledge, and the works of Whewell and Moore, should be carefully studied.

VI. In Political Economy, the works of Adam Smith, Bentham, Mill, Ricardo, Malthus, McCulloch, Martineau, Carey, Bishop Potter of Penn., E. Peabine Smith, Newman, Brougham, Alison, Jones, Whately, &c., will give the reader an insight into this vastly important, though till lately much misunderstood, subject. The Histories of Banking, by Hardcastle, Gilbert, Lawson, Bell, Gallatin, Gouge, &c., are useful works. See a list of choice works in Biography, Bibliography, and Belles-Lettres, in the Preface to this volume, and see Index.

We have now pursued the subject to a sufficient extent for this part of our work. The reader will see, by a reference to the Index of Subjects, that we have mentioned but a very few of the books noticed in our Dictionary.

We have, however, thought it well, in the preceding pages, to group together under their appropriate divisions, a number of works, many of which (in the Historical department, for instance,) are not well known to the ordinary reader. Full justice has been done to the extent of our ability to these, and the other departments of literature, in the succeeding pages of this volume. The author is not willing to doubt that the anxious labour of years which he has zealously bestowed upon this work, upon which the rising and the setting sun have so often found him employed, will be abundantly rewarded by its fruits. If he shall induce any to discover, in Literature, a solace in sorrow, a companion in solitude, a safeguard to morality, an incentive to virtue, and a guide to the immortal spirit in its aspirations after the good, the true, and the holy, he has served his generation and so far answered the ends of his being.

As we have frequently occasion to refer to the reigns of different English sovereigns without specifying dates,—temp. Edward II., temp. Henry II., &c.,—the following table of the Kings and Queens of England (from Pulleyn's Etymological Compendium) will prove of great service to the reader.

OF

British and American Literature and Authors.

ABB

Abbot, Abiel, D.D., 1770–1828, a native of Andover, Mass., graduated at Harvard College in 1787, accepted a pastoral charge at Haverhill about 1794, at Beverly about 1802. He was the author of, 1. Letters from Cuba, Boston, 1829. 2. Artillery Election Sermon, 1802. 3. Sermons to Mariners, 1812. 4. Address on Intemperance, 1815. 5. Sermon before the Salem Missionary Society, 1816. 6. Sermon before the Bible Society of Salem, 1817. 7. Convention Sermon, 1827.

"Dr. Abbot was very courteous and interesting in social intercourse, and was eloquent in preaching."

See Allen's Amer. Biog. Dict.; Flint's Sermon; Sketch in a Letter from Cuba.

Abbot, Charles, D.D., F.L.S., Vicar of Oakley Raynes, Bedfordshire; author of, 1. Flora Bedfordiensis, 1798. 2. A Monody on the Death of Lord Nelson, 1805. 3. Sermon on the Death of Horatio, Lord Nelson, 1806. 4. Parochial Divinity, or Sermons on various Subjects, 1807.

Abbot, Charles, Lord Colchester, 1757–1829, was the son of the Rev. John Abbot, D.D., Rector of All Saints, Colchester; educated at Westminster School, and Oxford. In 1795, he became M. P. for Halston, and speaker of the House, Feb. 10, 1802. In 1813, he defeated the Roman Catholic bill in committee. For fifteen years, he held the office of speaker H. C., and on his retirement was created Baron Colchester. He was the author of an essay On the Use and Abuse of Satire, Oxf., 1786. Speech in the Committee of the House of Commons on the Catholic Question, 1813.

Abbot, Charles, Lord Tenterden, 1762–1832, one of the Judges in the Court of King's Bench. Having been so long accustomed to the Bench, his lordship exhibited in his last moments a striking instance of the tenacity of the "ruling passion." The members of his family were gathered around him, to discharge the last sad offices of kindness, when he was observed to move his hand along the pillow, as if in the act of writing, and directly afterwards, he was heard to exclaim, almost in his official tone, "Gentlemen of the jury, you may retire;" he then closed his eyes, and expired. Author of, 1. Rules and Orders on the Plea Side of the Court of King's Bench, &c., 1795. 2. Jurisprudence and Practice of the Court of Great Sessions of Wales on the Chester Circuit, London, 1795, 9 vols. 3. Treatise on the Law relating to Merchant Ships and Seamen, in four parts, 1802. The seventh edition of this work, edited by Wm. Shee, was published London, 1844; Boston, 1846; eighth Lond. edition, 1847, royal 8vo.

"This book is a legal classic of high character, and is frequently cited upon questions of Commercial Law not altered by statute. It is equally distinguished for practical good-sense, and for extensive and accurate learning, remarkably compressed, and appropriately applied. Chancellor Kent made it the basis of the forty-seventh lecture of his Commentaries upon American Law. There have been five American editions of the work; but those of 1810 and 1820, enriched with notes and references to American cases by Mr. Justice Story, are the most valuable, except the late edition. In the fourth American edition, (1829,) now out of print, the learned annotator recast the notes and added many new ones. A new American edition has just been published, (1846,) containing the notes of Story and Shee, together with notes of American decisions, by J. C. Perkins, Esq. This edition is the most desirable one for the American lawyer. Abbot's was the first English treatise devoted exclusively to the law of shipping. In 1810, the work was translated into Portuguese. The late English edition by Shee is well spoken of, 13 Ves. 599; 3 Kent's Com. 250; 9 Legal Observer, 276; 1 Angell's Law Intelligencer, 73; 1 A. J. 321; 4 Jurist, 642."—Murvin's Legal Bibliography.

ABB

Sixth American edition, with additional annotations by J. C. Perkins, Boston, 1850; seventh edition, royal 8vo.

"This is truly a magnificent volume, of more than a thousand pages, containing the treatise of Lord Tenterden, or Mr. Abbot, as he is better known, with the additions of Sergeant Shee, and the notes of Judge Story and Mr. Perkins. In all that relates to the mechanical execution, table of cases, index, annotations, and appendix, this is incomparably the best edition of 'Abbot on Shipping,' that has ever been published."—Law Reporter.

Abbot, George, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1562–1633, was a native of Guildford, Surrey. Anthony Wood tells us, at the time he wrote the life of Robert, the brother of George, that the house where these brothers, afterwards so distinguished, were born, was occupied as an ale-house, bearing the sign of the Three Mariners; it was situated by the river's side, near to the bridge, on the north side of the street, in St. Nicholas's parish. Their father, a cloth-worker, evinced a laudable zeal for their welfare by having them instructed in the Free School of their native place, and then sending them in succession to Balliol College, Oxford. The two boys, thus benefited by paternal care, lived to reward this fatherly interest by the eminence and usefulness to which they both attained. Robert became Bishop of Salisbury, and George, the subject of our memoir, Archbishop of Canterbury. George entered Balliol College in 1578; became a Fellow in 1593; took his degree of D.D. in 1597, and was chosen in the same year Principal of University College. He was installed Dean of Winchester in 1599, and the year following was chosen Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford, to which he was again elected in 1603, and in 1608. Dr. Abbot was one of the eight Oxford divines to whom was committed the duty of translating the New Testament, (with the exception of the Epistles,) when the version by command of King James was undertaken in 1604. Wood speaks highly of his erudition:

"He was also a learned man, and had his erudition all of the old stamp. The things that he hath written show him to be a man of parts, learning, vigilance, and unwearied study, though overwhelmed with business."—Athen. Oxon.

When an effort was made in 1608 to effect a union between the national churches of Scotland and England, Hume, Earl of Dunbar, and Dr. Abbot were despatched to Scotland to further this object. An arrangement was made by which the bishops were to be perpetual moderators in the diocesan synods, and had the power of presentation to benefices, and of deprivation or suspension. The preferment which rewarded Abbot's successful management of this delicate business, is the best evidence of the approbation with which he was regarded by his royal patron. The bishopric of Lichfield and Coventry became vacant in 1609 by the death of Dr. Overton, and Dr. Abbot was appointed his successor. In the next month he was translated to the see of London, vacant by the death of Dr. Thomas Ravis; and Archbishop Bancroft dying in 1610, Bishop Abbot was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury.

It is not improbable that he owed his advancement as much to his adulation of his royal master—whose love of flattery is well known—as to the real merit which he unquestionably possessed, and his sincere attachment to the Protestant cause, in which his parents had suffered considerably. In the preface to one of his pamphlets, the following specimen of ridiculous flattery occurs;—speaking of the king, he says:

"Whose life hath been so immaculate, and unspotted, &c., that even malice itself, which leaves nothing unsearched, could never and true bluntness to it, nor cast probable suspicion on it. But even as a David, humbled and won, the solemnity of our age; religious as James, master of spreading Christ's faith as Constantine the Great, just as Moses condescended to all his ways as a Jehonathan and Mithridates, full of democracy as another Frederick."

It would also appear, from a letter of King James's to Abbot, first published by Dean Sherish, that his ideas of royal power were little likely to give offence even to such a prince as James, nevertheless Abbot could sometimes oppose the will of his sovereign with great decision and firmness, and his moderation in the exercise of his high functions recommended him greatly to the Puritan and popular party. He strenuously promoted the projected match between the Minor Palatine and the Princess Elizabeth, and performed their nuptial ceremony, on the 14th of February, 1612.

"It was acceptable news," says Neal, "to the English Puritans, to hear of a Protestant prince in Bohemia, and they earnestly desired his majesty to support him, as appears by Archbishop Abbot's letter, who was known to speak the sense of that whole party. This protest being asked his opinion as a privy councillor, while he was confined to his bed with the gout, wrote the following letter to the secretary of state:—That it was his opinion, that the doctor should accept the cross, that England should support him equally, and that as soon as news of his conversion should arrive, the bells should be rung, guns fired, and banquets made to let all England see that the king was determined to countenance him." The archbishop adds, "It is a great honour to our king to have such a man made a king, methinks I should in this the work of God, that by deposing the kings of the earth shall leave the throne to desolation. Our striving in will comfort the Bohemians, and bring in the Dutch and the Dutch, and Hungary will run the same fortune. As for money and means, let us trust God and the Parliament, as the old and honourable means of raising money. This from my bed, (says the brave old prelate,) September 12, 1612, and when I am stand, I will do better service."

"The affairs of the divorce of the Lady Scotch, has been considered one of the greatest blunders of James's reign. The king referred the matter to a court of delegates consisting of bishops and divines, which he supposed would decide in favour of the divorce, but the archbishop boldly resisted the measure, and confidence was given to the lady's favour. On another occasion, the archbishop set himself against the views and wishes of the king and court, when there was a higher objection which he overcame. Happening to be at Croydon, in 1614, on the day when the king's proclamation permitting sports and pastimes on the Sabbath, was ordered to be read in all churches, he forbade it to be published in the church of that place."—Compton's Reg. Hist. of England.

"In 1621, whilst taking a journey into Hampshire, the archbishop was invited by Lord Scouth to hunt in Rushmill Park. Pretending to be a woodsman, he took up a scimitar to make a shot at a buck, but unhappily hit the keeper, who had run in among the herd of deer, to bring them up to a silver mark. The arrow pierced the left arm, and dividing the large axillary vessels, caused instantaneous death. 'He never spoke after,' says Fuller, 'at the prison, still alive at Croydon, who brought off his lady, instructed me. This untoward event caused the greatest consternation—the like had never happened in the Church of England. It was a sore affliction to many good men, who lamented the murder which must by this untoward accident inevitably fall upon the church, for in the eye of general ecclesiology, and the more so, the archbishop was wonderfully talented, and made incapable of performing any sacred function. By the common law his personal estate was forfeited to the king, who graciously sent him a letter under his own hand, that he would not add affliction to his sorrow, nor take one thing from his charnels and moribund.' Fuller, p. 66. But the amulet brought upon the church was not so readily removed. It was a subject of discussion in the foreign universities, and after three several disquisitions, was declared by the Sorbonists to amount to a positive irregularity. To add to the difficulty, these bishops almost were waiting for their annuities."

house at Guildford.—Hume's Letters, p. 122. However, after the decision of the commission, he returned to Lambeth, and resumed his functions. A monthly stipend of £20 per annum to the widow proved the sincerity of his grief. After much ill health, which for a season caused a suspension of the discharge of his episcopal duties, he regained his health in a great measure, as is proved by the following anecdote, extracted from a M.S. letter in the British Museum:

"One day the last week, my lord of Arundel, and his son, my lord Maitland, having called my lord of Chesham's church on Barnard Down, coming towards them, before they came a half length short of it, both their lordships alighted, and went a great pace towards his grace's coach, who, when they were approached, said, 'What! and meet my lord Marshal of England this on grand pains to do me so much honour?' 'Were my legs as good as my heart, I should have met your lordship the better half of the way.' Then my lord of Arundel replied, 'It might well become an archbishop to give so much respect to an Archbishop of Chesham.' His grace, by his first, both so moderated his grief, as it is now rather an infirmity than a pain. He looks fresh, and enjoys his health, and hath his wife and familiars about him. So that, if any other prelate do gaze after his lordship, his grace, perhaps, according to the old and homely proverb, [may] not of the game which shall grace upon his grace."—Hist. MSS. 1000.

His grace was never married, and seems to have had a natural antipathy to women. One day, (as Fuller tells us in his Appeal, &c.) returning in his coach to Croydon, from which he had been some time absent, many people, most women, come of good quality, partly from curiosity and novelty, crowded around his coach to see him. The archbishop, unwilling to be gazed at, and never partial to females, exclaimed, somewhat shrilly, "What makes these women here?" "You had best," said one of them, "shoot an arrow at us." The archbishop died at Croydon on Sunday, August 4, 1633. His remissness in matters of church discipline has been much censured.—Rees's Dict. Doct. ; L'Estrange's Charles I.

For further particulars respecting this prelate, the reader is referred to the recorded opinions of his contemporaries, Hooker, Fuller, Osborne, Clarendon, Sanderson, Goodman, Heylin, and others, also to L'Estrange's "Reign of King Charles," and the Biographia Britannica.

When Grotius was sent to England upon behalf of the "Remonstrants," he does not seem to have made a very favourable impression upon the archbishop, who draws no flattering picture of the great scholar in a letter to Sir Ralph Winwood. (See Biog. Britannica.) Some extracts from this curious epistle will be uninteresting to the reader.

"At his first coming to the king, by reason of his good Latin tongue, he was so tedious, and full of dissimulation, that the king's judgment was of him, that he was more pedant, full of words, and of no great judgment. And I myself discovering that to be his habit, as if he did imagine that every man was bound to hear him, so long as he would talk, (which is a great burden to men capable with business,) did privately give him notice thereof, that he should plainly and directly deliver his mind, or else he would make the king weary of him. This, one would think, would prove a sufficient hint to the garrulous Hollander to repress his loquacity, but it came otherwise. Afterwards he fell to it again, as was especially observed one night at supper at the Lord Bishop of Ely, a whither being brought by Mr. Arundel, (as I think,) my lord intrusted him to stay to supper which he did. There was present, Dr. Steward, and another divine, unto whom he flung out some questions of that pedantic, and was so full of words, that Dr. Steward afterwards told my lord, that he did perceive by him, that like a snail, he had studied some two or three questions, thereof when he came in company, he must be talking to vivandis his still, but if he were put from those, he would show himself but a simple fellow."

What a character of the great Grotius! He seems to have been a kind of ancient Cicerone, without the patient audience, and remarkable power of attraction, which that eminent conversationalist so often enjoyed. The hospitable prelate of Ely seems to have been so much overwhelmed with the tide of talk as were the guests:

"My lord of Ely sitting still at the supper all the while, and wondering what a man he had there, who, never being in the place or company before, could converse with us so long a time."

The archbishop was the author of the following works: 1. Quæstiones Sex, totidem Propositionibus in quibus Theologia Oxoniensis pro forma habitus discipuli ad disceptationem, Anno 1597; in quibus de Sacra Scriptura et Patribus Antiquissimis quid statuendum sit, definit, Oxon. 1608, 4to. 2. Exposition on the Prophet Jonah, by way of Sermon, Oxford, 1600, 4to. These sermons were received with great applause, and were reprinted in 1612. 3. *A preface to the examination of George Spots. Abbot, George, 1604–1648, nephew of the preceding. Elected probationer fellow of Merton College, Oxford, 1624. He married a daughter of Colonel Purefoy, of Caldecote-hall, Warwickshire, and defended the colonel's house, by the help of his servants only, against Princes Rupert and Maurice, with eighteen troops of horse. He wrote, 1. The whole Book of Job paraphrased, London, 4to, 1640. 2. Vindiciae Sabbati, or an answer to two treatises of Mr. Broad, London, 1641, 4to. 3. Brief Notes upon the whole Book of Psalms, London, 1651, 4to. He died February 4, 1648.

Abbot, Robert, 1560–1617, elder brother to the Archbishop, was educated at the same school with his brother. Upon an oration made by him, on the day of Queen Elizabeth's inauguration, he was chosen scholar of Balliol College. In 1594, he obtained some celebrity as an author by a book which he published against a Romanist, entitled The Mirror of Popish Subtilties, &c. In 1597, he was made a doctor of divinity; in 1601, he published The Exultation of the Kingdom and Priesthood of Christ, being a collection of Sermons on the first part of the 110th Psalm. King James I. was so much pleased with Dr. Abbot's treatise, "Antichristi Demonstrati contra fabulas Pontificius et ineptam Rob. Bellarmini de Antichristo disputationem," that he commanded his own Commentary on the Apocalypse to be appended to the second edition of this treatise, which was published in 1603, 8vo. In 1615, he was promoted to the see of Salisbury, and died March 2, 1617. Dr. Abbot also published, 1. A defence of the Reformed Catholic of Mr. William Perkins, 1606, 1607, and 1609, to which work he added a particular treatise, entitled, The true ancient Roman Catholic. 2. *Antologia contra apologiam A. Abbott, Benj. V., b. 1830, Boston; Austin, b. 1831, Boston; and Lyman, b. 1835, Roxbury, Mass. These three brothers, sons of Jacob Abbott, are engaged in the practice of law in New York City. They are authors of several legal works published under their copartnership-name, "Abbott Brothers." Admiralty Reports, 1 vol.; N. York Practice Reports, 6 vols., (still continued); Forms of Pleading under the New York Code, 1 vol. They have also published an edition of Sedgwick on Damages, with Notes; and have contributed numerous legal articles to Livingston's Law Mag., Hunt's Merchant's Mag., The Young Men's Mag., and other periodicals. The novel Conecut Corners, written in support of the policy of prohibitory temperance-laws, and published under their own de plume, "Benally," (under which they have made many contributions to current literature,) is also the joint production of these brothers.

Abbott, Rev. Jacob, b. 1803, at Hallowell, Maine, graduated at Bowdoin College, 1820. Mr. Abbott's principal works are The Young Christian, The Corner-Stone, Way to do Good, The Teacher, Hoary Head and McDonner, Summer in Scotland, A Series of Histories of Celebrated Sovereigns, and a large number of juvenile works, such as The Rollo Books, 28 vols.; The Franconia Stories, 10 vols.; Marco Paul's Adventures, 6 vols.; Harper's Story-Books, 36 vols.; The Little Learner Series, 5 vols., &c. These works have had an extensive circulation in this country, and have nearly all been republished repeatedly, and in many different forms, in England. Many of them have been translated into various foreign languages both in Europe and Asia.

Sir John Williams remarks of "The Young Christian,"

"I have seldom seen a religious publication so striking and so adapted for usefulness."

"Jacob Abbott's last work, 'The Way to do Good,' will, I think, please you very much. It is delightful to read a book so good and so sensible,—so zealous for what is valuable, so fair about what is indifferent."—The late Dr. Arnold, in a letter to Sir Thomas Parnley.

Abbott, Rev. John S. C., brother of Rev. Jacob Abbott, b. 1805, at Brunswick, Maine, graduated at Bowdoin College, 1825, and at the Theological Seminary in Andover, Mass., 1829. His principal works are The Mother at Home, first pub. 1833; The Child at Home; Kings and Queens; the Histories of Marie Antoinette, Josephine, Made. Roland, Cortez, Henry IV. of France, King Philip, Sovereign Chief of the Wampanoags; these six vols. constitute Abbott's Historical Series. The History of Napoleon Bonaparte, 2 vols. r. 8vo, profusely illustrated. This work has been very severely criticized,—with what justice must be referred to the judgment of the intelligent reader. All of these works have had a very extensive sale. The Mother at Home has been translated into nearly all the languages of modern Europe, and has been republished in Asia and Africa. It is considered one of the best expositions of the important responsibilities of which it treats. Napoleon at St. Helena, 8vo; Confidential Correspondence of Napoleon and Josephine; History of the French Revolution.

A respectable authority thus commends Mr. Abbott's Mother at Home:

"There has never before, perhaps, issued from the press a work so important to mothers as the one before us. It takes such estimates of the maternal character as are overwhelming in their solemnity. The author has shown himself a master of his subject, and he has treated it with equal delicacy and force."—London Evangelical Magazine.

Abercrombie, John, 1726-1806, a Scotchman, who wrote many works on Horticulture. His first work, the Gardener's Calendar, was published in the name of Mr. Mawe, gardener to the Duke of Leeds. For this loan of his name, Mr. Mawe received a gratuity of twenty guineas. Abercrombie published fourteen works on his favourite subject, the most important of which was The Universal Gardener and Botanist, or a General Dictionary of Gardening and Botany, exhibiting in botanical arrangement, according to the Linnæan System, every Tree, Shrub, and Herbaceous Plant that merits Culture, &c., London, 1778.

Abercrombie, John, M.D., 1781-1844, born at Aberdeen. He was deservedly esteemed in his profession, and equally so as a writer upon Metaphysics. He made the physician the instructor of the philosopher, and sanctified the knowledge of the one and the meditations of the other by the most fervent piety. With these qualifications for usefulness, the death of Dr. Abercrombie was indeed a public calamity. He studied in Edinburgh, and took his degree there on June 4, 1803. He became a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1805. On the decease of the celebrated Dr. Gregory, in 1821, he began to occupy the most prominent position as a practising and consulting physician not only in Edinburgh, but in all Scotland.

"The writings of Dr. Abercrombie contribute no less to the establishment and maintenance of his fame than his very useful career as a practical member of his profession."

"In this work, which is characterized by no ordinary degree of purely scientific knowledge, he also gave an indication of the bent of his genius to the study of mind and its relations to the body."

2. Pathological and Practical Researches on the Diseases of the Intestinal Canal, Liver, and other Viscera of the Abdomen, Edin., 1828, 8vo. His Inquiries concerning the Intellectual Powers was published in 1830, The Philosophy of the Moral Feelings in 1833.

"On the whole, this work [Intellectual Powers] must be considered as containing much useful information. If some of his arguments are formed with little attention to vigour, we must remember that he wrote for many who cannot appreciate a course of reasoning that is not conducted in a popular manner."—North American Review.

Abercrombie, Patrick, M.D., 1656-1720, born at Forfar, in Angus. His principal work was The Martial Achievements of the Scots Nation, Edinburgh, 1711-15, of which Lowndes says:

"The first volume abounds in the marvellous, but the second is valuable on account of its accurate information respecting the British history in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Roxburgh, &c. 7. 8."

Abercromby, David, a Scotchman, the author of a number of medical works, published from 1684-87.

Abercromby, David, supposed to be the same as the preceding, wrote, 1. Protestancy to be embraced, or a Method to reduce Romanists from Popery to Protestantism, London, 1682. 2. A Moral Discourse on the power of Interest, London, 1690-94, and 1744.

Abernethy, John, 1680-1740, born at Coleraine, died at Dublin, a Presbyterian divine, and noted for his zeal in the cause of the Protestant religion.

"He was a burning and a shining light in his day. Polished in manners, possessing a rich fund of intelligence, with uncommon powers of conversation, &c., he was esteemed and admired as a man, in the private intercourse of life."—JAMIESON.

His Sermons on the Being and Perfections of God were widely celebrated, as is evinced by the many editions which have been printed. Four volumes of Posthumous Sermons were published in 1748, 1751, with a life of the author prefixed.

"For solidity of argument, strength and clearness of reasoning, and justness of sentiment, the Discourses on the Attributes are equal, if not superior, to any thing of the kind in the English language."—Protestant Preacher.

These Discourses were published, London, 1740, &c.

Abernethy, John, 1763-1831, Surgeon to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, and Teacher of Anatomy and Surgery. His birthplace is a matter of doubt; either the town of Abernethy in Scotland, or Derry in Ireland. He was sixteen years of age when apprenticed to Mr. (afterwards Sir Charles) Blick, then Surgeon to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. At the age of twenty-two, he was appointed Assistant Surgeon, and at the death of Sir Charles Blick he succeeded to the principal post. In 1793, he commenced his series of physiological and surgical essays, which in 1797 were combined into an 8vo volume. In 1784, he published part of his Surgical Observations, containing a classification of tumours, with cases to illustrate the history of each species, &c., and two years afterwards, Part Second appeared, presenting an account of disorders of the health in general, and of the digestive organs in particular, which accompany local diseases and obstruct their cure. In 1809, he gave to the public his work on the Constitutional Origin and Treatment of Local Disease, and on Aneurism. A separate volume was likewise published by him on Diseases resembling Syphilis, and Injuries of the Head; as also, (in 1814,) An Inquiry into the Probability and Rationality of Hunter's Theory of Life, in which he embodied the substance of the first two lectures he delivered before the College of Surgeons, as their professor, and wherein he maintained and illustrated the doctrines of his great master. He expired at his country residence at Enfield, April 20, 1831. His disease was asthma, (complicated probably with diseased heart, although he attributed much to the stomach,) and consequent dropsy. His body was not examined, in accordance, as it is understood, with his own desire. As a surgeon, Abernethy was surpassed by none of his contemporaries. Hunter had previously proposed and practised the application of ligature on the femoral artery for the cure of popliteal aneurism; and this principle was further and successfully extended by Abernethy to the external iliac and carotid arteries, in the treatment of the same disease in some of their offshoots. His simple and impressive style of lecturing never failed to enchain the attention of his audience; while a certain degree of dogmatism and contempt of those who differed from him had too much the effect of rendering his hearers any thing but humble-minded in their judgment of others. In his writings, as in his lectures, his style is clear, simple, and concise.—Rose's New Biog. Dict. His great success in life must be, in a great measure, attributed to his having directed the attention of the public to the influence of derangement of the organs of digestion on all the diseases to which flesh is heir. This view of the subject was not altogether novel, but the profession had not paid sufficient attention to it. Abernethy always opposed, with great zeal, the artificial line of demarcation drawn between surgery and medicine; he considering the two sciences as "one and indivisible." Let the reader imagine a snug, elderly, sleek, and venerable-looking man, approaching seventy years of age, rather below than above the middle height, somewhat inclined to corpulency, and still upright in his carriage, with his hair most primly powdered, and nicely curled round his brow and temples. Let them imagine such a person habited in sober black, with his feet thrust carelessly in a pair of unlaced half-boots, and his hands deposited in the pockets of his "peculiar," and they have the "glorious John" of the profession before their eyes.—Physic and Physicians. Abernethy's rudeness of manner is well known, and was a great blemish in the character of one who really possessed a most benevolent heart. We subjoin some anecdotes of this eminent physician, collected from various sources.

His eccentricities disgusted so many patients, that Sir Astley Cooper used to say, "Abernethy's manner was worth a thousand a year to him."

Some of his patients he would cut short with—"Sir, I have heard enough! You have heard of my book?" "Yea." "Then go home and read it." To a lady complaining of low spirits, he would say, "Don't come to me! Go and buy a skipping-rope!" Sometimes, however, he met with his match:—Cutting a gentleman, one day, short, the patient suddenly locked the door, slipped the key into his pocket, and protested he would be heard; which so pleased Abernethy, that he not only complied with the patient's wishes, but complimented him on the resolute manner he adopted.

He was a great enemy to prolix explanations on the part of his patients. "People come here," he would often say, "to consult me, and they will torture me with their long, foolish, fiddle-de-dee stories; so we quarrel; and then they blackguard me all about this busy town; but I can't help that." A lady, determined to treat him after his own fashion, having in some way injured her thumb, on entering his room, merely thrust it out towards him, with—"My thumb, sir!" "You, madam," said he, "are the only sensible woman I ever had for a patient."

The Duke of W—, having insisted on seeing him out of his usual hours, abruptly entered his parlour one day; he asked him how he got into the room. "By the door," was the reply. "Then," said Abernethy, "I recommend you to make your exit by the same way." He refused to attend George the Fourth until he had delivered his lecture at the hospital; in consequence of which he lost a royal appointment.

On Abernethy's receiving the appointment of Professor of Anatomy and Surgery to the Royal College of Physicians, a professional friend observed to him that they should have something new. "What do you mean?" asked Abernethy. "Why," said the other, "of course you will brush up the lectures which you have been so long delivering at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and let us have them in an improved form." "Do you take me for a fool or a knave?" rejoined Abernethy. "I have always given the students at the hospital that to which they were entitled—the best produce of my mind. If I could have made my lectures to them better, I would certainly have made them so. I will give the College of Surgeons precisely the same lectures, down to the smallest details; nay, I will tell the old fellows how to make a poultice." Soon after, when he was lecturing to the students at St. Bartholomew's, and advertising to the College of Surgeons, he chucklingly exclaimed, "I told the big wigs how to make a poultice." It is said, by those who have seen it, that Dr. Abernethy's explanation of the art of making a poultice was irresistibly entertaining. His hobby retained full possession of his mind to the end of his life. He attributed, as we have seen, his disease in a great measure to the stomach. He said, "It is all stomach: we use our stomach ill when we are young, and it uses us ill when we are old."

He wrote for Dr. Rees's Cyclopædia the anatomical and physiological articles, from the letter A to the word Canal; of which that on Artery is considered the most important.—Georgian Era; "Physic and Physicians."

The following is a list of his works:—1. Surgical and Physiological Essays, London, 1793–97, three parts. 2. Surgical Observations, containing a Classification of Tumours, with cases to illustrate the History of each Species. An account of Diseases which strikingly resemble the Venereal Disease, and various Cases illustrative of different Surgical Subjects, London, 1804. 3. Surgical Observations, Part Second, containing an Account of the Disorders of the Health in general, and of the Digestive Organs in particular, which accompany Local Diseases, and obstruct their cure. Observations on the diseases of the Urethra, particularly of that part which is surrounded by the Prostate Gland: and observations relative to the Treatment of one species of the Nævi Maternæ, London, 1806, 1816. The four following articles may be considered as an enlarged edition of this and the preceding: 4. Surgical Observations on the Constitutional Origin and Treatment of Local Diseases, and on Aneurisms, London, 1809; third edition, 1813. 5. Surgical Observations, Part Second, containing Observations on the Origin and Treatment of Pseudo-syphilitic Diseases, and on Diseases of the Urethra, London, 1810. 6. Surgical Observations on Injuries of the Head, and other Miscellaneous Subjects, London, 1810. 7. Surgical Observations on Tumours, and on Lumbar Abscesses, London, 1811. This and the preceding are intended to form two volumes. 8. An Inquiry into the Probability and Rationality of Mr. Hunter's Theory of Life, being the subject of the first two Anatomical Lectures before the Royal College of Surgeons, London, 1814. 9. The Introductory Lecture for the year 1815, exhibiting some of Mr. Hunter's Opinions respecting Diseases; delivered before the Royal College of Surgeons, London, 1815. 10. Physiological Lectures, 1817. Surgical Works, a new edition, 1815. 11. An Account of a singular Disease in the Upper Maxillary Sinus. Trans. Med. et Chir. 2p. 309, 1800. 12. Account of Two Instances of Uncommon Formations in the Viscera of the Human Body. Phil. Trans. IV. 1796, Abr. 18p. 675. The celebrated "My Book," to which he was so fond of referring his patients, was the "Surgical Observations, &c." (See Nos. 2 and 3 above.) He thus addresses a patient, "Well, sir, as to the question of diet, I must refer you to my book. There are only about a dozen pages, in which you will find (beginning at page 73) all that is necessary for you to know. I am christened 'Doctor My-Book,' and satirized under that name all over England; but who would sit and listen to a long lecture of twelve pages, or remember one-half of it when it is done? So I have reduced my directions into writing, and there they are, for anybody to follow, if they please."

The reader should procure Mr. George Macilwain's Memoirs of John Abernethy, with a view of his Writings, Lectures, and Character, London, 2 vols. p. 8vo. 1853.

"Abernethy's memory is worthy of a good biographer, and happily it has found one. Mr. Macilwain writes well; and, evidently, in giving the history of his deceased friend he executed a labour of love."—London Standard.

Able or Abel, Thomas, an English divine, executed at Smithfield, temp. Henry VIII., 1540. The title which follows sufficiently explains the offence given to the king; to which Able added the still further provocation of denying the king's supremacy in matters ecclesiastical: 1. Tractatus de non dissolvendo Henrici et Catherine matrimonio, Inviolata Veritas. An Answer that by no manner of means it may be lawful for the King to be divorced from the Queen's Grace, his lawful Wife. The king did not, as in the case of Luther, attempt to confute Dr. Able by polemical arguments, but this being a question where the sword was likely to be more powerful than the pen, his majesty brought into requisition a logic which has never failed to silence—if not convince. Dr. Able's reasoning may have been perfect, but he argued at a disadvantage. Between a syllogism and an axe the contest is unequal. The king gained his point, for he was divorced, and remarried; while good Dr. Able sealed his testimony at Smithfield.

Acca, died 740. In the course of his numerous writings, Bede introduces the names of several of his literary friends, most of whom, as we learn from other sources, were eminently distinguished for their learning and virtues.

Many of the most important of his commentaries on the Scriptures were composed at the desire of Acca, Bishop of Hexham, and dedicated to that prelate. Acca was a man of considerable learning, and great piety; he had received his first instructions among the congregation of scholars assembled around Bishop Bosa, and he quitted their society to place himself under Wilfred, who ordained him a presbyter. He continued to be one of Wilfred's most faithful followers until his death, accompanied him on his last journey to Rome, (where he finished his studies,) and was chosen to succeed him in the see of Hexham. Bede describes the zeal with which he laboured to adorn and enlarge his church, and to enrich it with "a most ample and noble library." In 731, when Bede completed his history, Acca is mentioned as still holding the bishopric of Hexham; but soon afterwards, in 732 or 733, he was driven from it for some cause now unknown. He seems to have retired to Whiltern, (Candida Casa,) where he remained a few years. The date of his death is uncertain; but the best authorities place it on the twentieth of October, 740, when his body was carried to Hexham, to be buried in the church which owed to him so much of its beauty. Bale and Pits have so far misunderstood the words of Bede, as to attribute to Acca a collection of lives of the saints whose relics were deposited in the church of Hexham, and a treatise, "De ecclesiasticis sui chori officiis." On the same authority also, Leyer places the name of Acca in the list of mediæval Latin poets. Leland speaks as having seen a collection of his letters, one of which, addressed to Bede, is still preserved, in which he urges that scholar to devote his learning to the illustration of the Scriptures.—Abbreviated from *Wright's Biog. He published the History of the American Indians, particularly those nations adjoining the Mississippi, East and West Florida, South Carolina, Georgia, and Virginia, London, 1775. Mr. Adair espouses the opinion that the North American Indians are descended from the Hebrews.

Adair, James Makittrick, M.D., 1728-1802, was born at Inverness. He resided for some time in the West Indies, and took much interest in the exciting question of the Abolition of Slavery. His kindness to the slaves was so marked as to gain their warmest affections. He was a most determined opponent of quackery, and thereby became involved in many controversies. Philip Thicknesse and Adair, either no mean hand at a quarrel, took up the cudgels against each other. He wrote a number of medical and miscellaneous works.

Adalard is only known as one of the early biographers of Dunstan, who probably brought him over from Ghent, as he states that he was a monk of the same monastery in which Dunstan had found an asylum during his exile. He dedicated his Life of Dunstan to Archbishop Alfheh, at whose desire it was written, and who was raised to the see of Canterbury in 1006. Adalard's Life of Dunstan is called in some manuscripts an "Eulogium;" it is, in fact, rather a commemorative sermon than a history, and is written in a declamatory style.—*Wright's Biog. Brit. Adam, Robert, 1728-1792, an architect of much note. His father, also an architect, sent him to the University of Edinburgh, where he made the acquaintance of Hume, Robertson, &c. He went to Italy, and profited by his diligent observation. Desirous of obtaining a knowledge of the habitations of the ancients, in 1757 he visited, with M. Clerisseau, the ruins of Dioclesian's palace at Spalatro. The result of this visit was given to the world in 1764, in Ruins of the Palace of the Emperor Dioclesian, at Spalatro, in Dalmatia, illustrated with 71 plates. In 1762 he received the appointment of Architect to their Majesties. In conjunction with his brother, Mr. James Adam, he published several numbers of a book entitled The Works in Architecture of R. and J. Adam. These contain descriptions of Stion-house, Caen-Wood, Leeton Park-house, and some edifices at Whitehall, Edinburgh, &c., 4 parts, 1773-76. His buildings in Edinburgh and Glasgow have been much commended. The Adelphi and Portland Place in London are specimens of the taste of Mr. R. Adam. In the former he was assisted by his brother James, who died in 1794.

Adam Scotus, or the Scotchman, died 1180, was a monk of the order of Premonstré, and a famous Sorbonne doctor. He wrote the Life of David I. of Scotland, who died 1153. Many of his works are still in MS. A selection was printed in Antwerp in 1659.

Adam De Marisco, (of the Marsh,) date of birth and death unknown. Born in Somersetshire, England; studied at Oxford, and became famous for his learning. He was a friend of Robert Grosseteste and Roger Bacon. Many of his works exist in MS. A copy of his letters, very curious and interesting, is in the British Museum.

Adam of Murimouth, an English historian of the fourteenth century, was educated at Oxford, and afterwards a canon of St. Paul's, London. His history comprehends only a portion of the fourteenth century.

"It was printed at Oxford in 1723, by Anthony Hall: and a small portion was edited by Thomas Hearne, who was ignorant of its author, and gave it anonymously in the appendix to the History of Walter Hemingford, printed at Oxford in 1731."—Rose's Biog. Dic.

Adam, Thomas, 1701-1784, born at Leeds, was for 58 years the rector of Winttingham, Lincolnshire. No offers of preferment could induce him to relinquish his charge. He was the author of a number of religious works. The Exposition of St. Matthew's Gospel was published in 1805, and in 1837 the Rev. A. Westoby added to the above the notes on St. Mark, St. Luke, and St. John, and prefixed to the work a life of the author.

"Perhaps few were better fitted to write a practical experimental commentary on any part of the Scriptures than this author, whose pregnant brevity of remark, and deep acquaintance with experimental religion, would preserve him from prolixity, and enable him to present the most useful view of the subject to the mind. The present posthumous work will be found characterised by all the best peculiarities of the author."—Records.

The Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne, a most competent judge in the premises, gives this high character to "The Exposition."

"Brevity of remark, fervent piety, and intimate acquaintance with the human heart, characterise this Exposition of the Four Gospels."

"Such a writer as Mr. Adam takes us out of our ordinary track of reading and reflection, and shows us ourselves. He scrutinises the whole soul, dissipates the false glares which is apt to mislead the judgment; exposes the imperfections of what is apparently most pure and inviting; and thus teaches us to make our religion more and more spiritual, holy, solid, practical, humble, and sincere."—REV. DANIEL WILSON.

"This work has been justly pronounced a masterly and excellent exposition."

Adams, John, 1735-1826, second President of the United States of America, was born at Braintree, Mass.

"His father determined to give him a collegiate education, and placed him in consequence under the care of Mr. Marsh, that he might be prepared for entrance into the University of Cambridge. He remained in that institution until the year 1755, when he received his Bachelor's degree, and, in 1758, that of Master of Arts."

In 1765, he published in the Boston Gazette several pieces, which were reprinted in London, in 1768, by Mr. Thos. Hollis, and called by him A Dissertation on Canon and Feudal Law. He also wrote certain pieces for the Boston Gazette, under the anonymous signature of Novanglus, which were inserted in Almon's Remembrancer. These papers were afterwards collected and pub. in London, in a pamphlet entitled A History of the Quarrel between Great Britain and the American Colonies; A Defence of the Constitutions of Government of the United States of America against the attack of Mr. Turgot in his letter to Dr. Price dated March 22, 1778, Lon., 1787, '88. This work was reprinted by Stockdale in 1794, who prefixed to it the title of History of the Principal Republics of the World.

"This is both a learned and a judicious work. The writings of Mr. Adams are less known in this country than their merit demands."—Rose's New Biog. Dict.

Discourses on Davila: a Series of Papers on Political History, by an American Citizen, Bost., 1805. This work was compiled from articles in the Gazette of the United States written by Mr. Adams in 1790. For a complete list of Mr. Adams's pamphlets, &c., see Life and Works of John Adams, second President of the United States; edited by his grandson, Charles Francis Adams, 10 vols. 8vo, 1850-56.

The collection is edited by the Hon. Charles Francis Adams, the depository of all the manuscripts as well of John Adams as of his father, the late John Quincy Adams, and is intended as the first of two great publications elucidating the history of the rise and progress of these United States from the year 1761, in which the Revolutionary struggle first began, down to the year 1848, when the younger Adams died."

"Of the writings of our Revolutionary worthies none have been presented to the public with so much ability, care, and good faith as those of John Adams. The main portion of the labor devolved on Charles Francis Adams, who has devoted to it several years, and has set an example of thorough research and sound judgment which cannot be too highly commended."—Dr. Rufus W. Griswold.

"A contribution to the materials of American history not second in importance and interest to any of the great publications with which it is most obviously to be compared."—N. Amer. Rev.

Adams, John Quincy, 1767-1848, sixth President of the United States, was b. July 11, at Quincy, Mass., son of John Adams, second President of the U. States. At the age of ten he accompanied his father to Europe, and, under his eye, prosecuted his studies during the greater part of the ensuing ten years, being part of the time at school in Leyden, and a part accompanying Mr. Dana on his mission to St. Petersburg, acting as Secretary and French interpreter. Again he was sent to Europe, in 1795, on a public mission to Holland. From thence he was transferred to Berlin, where he passed four years, in the last of which he made a journey through Silesia. His letters were collected by Mr. Ashbury Dickens and published without authority in London in 1804. They were trans. into German by F. G. Friese, with remarks by F. A. Zimmerman, and pub. at Breslau, 1805; trans. into French by J. Dupuy, Paris, 1807. Mr. A. trans. the work of Frederick de Gentz, entitled The Origin and Principles of the American Revolution compared with the Origin and Principles of the French Revolution, Phila., 8vo. He also trans. Wieland's Oberon, MS. Of his numerous productions the principal are A Report on Weights and Measures made to Congress, Wash., 1818, 8vo; Lectures on Rhetoric and Oratory, Camb., 2 vols. 8vo; Dermot McMorrogh, an Historical Tale, Bost., 1832, 8vo; Letters on the Masonic Institution, 1847, 8vo; Eulogies on Madison, (1836,) Monroe, (1831,) and La Fayette, (1834;) Jubilee of the Constitution, N. "We then went to Pembroke College, and waited on his old friend Dr. Adams, the master of it, whom I found to be a most polite, pleasing, communicative man. He had distinguished himself by an able answer to David Hume's 'Essay on Miracles.' He told me he had once dined in company with Hume in London; that Hume shook hands with him, and said, 'You have treated me much better than I deserve;' and that they exchanged visits."

Addison, G. H., 1793-1815, author of Indian Reminiscences, or the Bengal Moofussal Miscellany, 1837.

Addison, Joseph, 1672-1719, one of the most eminent of English authors, was the eldest son of Lancelot Addison, D.D., Dean of Lichfield, the author of some theological treatises noticed hereafter. Joseph was born at Milston, near Ambros-Bury, Wiltshire, May 1, 1672. After passing through his preliminary studies at Amesbury and Salisbury, he became an inmate of the Charter-house, where he made the acquaintance of a youth who subsequently became celebrated as his associate, and an important literary character:—the names of Richard Steele and Joseph Addison have become so closely united, that they must descend in unbroken partnership to the latest generations. At the age of fifteen he was entered at King's College, Oxford, where his father had preceded him. He here applied himself with such diligence to classical learning, that he "acquired an elegant Latin style before he arrived at that age in which had usually begin to write good English." The excellence of his Latin poetry soon made him famous in both universities. At a later day these fruits of early scholarship were collected and published in the Musa Anglicana.

"Our country owes it to him, that the famous Monsieur Boileau first conceived an opinion of the English genius for poetry, by perusing the present he made him of the Musa Anglicana."—TICKELL: Preface to Addison's Works.

When about twenty-two years of age, he addressed some verses to Dryden, commending his translations, which were highly praised by the most eminent judges, and were so fortunate as to elicit the plaudits of Dryden himself. A translation of the greater part of the fourth book of Virgil's Georgics, confirmed the good opinion which the great poet was inclined to entertain of the abilities of this youthful follower. The excellent critical preface to Dryden's version of the Georgics, and many of the arguments, were from the pen of the new aspirant to poetical distinction. A running criticism in verse on some of the principal English poets, addressed to Sacheverell, and some other productions of merit, still further increased the reputation of the author. So far, all was most encouraging; but this "fancied life in others' breath," as one of the poets styles Fame, was an unsubstantial dependence for the everyday necessities of life. At this juncture, in 1695, a poem addressed to King William, on one of his campaigns, dedicated to Lord Keeper Somers, secured the favour of this nobleman, and a pension of £300 per annum. About this period he published his Latin poems, inscribed to another great man of the day, Mr. Montague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, afterwards Lord Halifax. It is said to have been chiefly owing to the discouragement of this eminent statesman, that Addison resigned his original intention of taking holy orders. Other accounts represent his own humility to have suggested to his mind distrust of his qualifications and fitness for a position so sacred and responsible. Whether the voice of ambition at this season of youthful triumph was permitted to drown the pleadings of conscience, it is impossible to decide; but there appear to us to be many intimations in the future writings of the lay moralist, that the convictions of religious duty ever remained stronger than the arguments by which they were overruled. About the end of the year 1699, Addison determined to gratify an inclination which insufficient means had heretofore obliged him to postpone, and he left England on a visit to the classic soil of Italy. Fortunately, we are not left to conjecture what must have been the effects of scenes so inspiring upon a mind so well educated to appreciate their power. In his remarks on several parts of Italy, in the years 1701, 2, 3, we have a record of his impressions, which deserves more notice than it receives in the present day, or indeed has secured in any preceding generation of readers. The death of King William, in 1702, brought a new set of statesmen in power, and the loss of Addison's pension awakened the young traveller from his classic dreams of past ages to the necessary provision for the day which was passing over him. He returned home, and found himself in England with no means of livelihood, and no prospects beyond the uncertain dependence of a literary hack. He was not allowed to remain long in this unenviable condition. The battle of Blenheim, fought August, 1704, had excited the attention of Europe to the conquerors, and the opportunity must not be lost to celebrate the event in the most august strains of which the poetic muse was capable. Lord Treasurer Godolphin inquired anxiously for a poet, and Lord Halifax named Addison as the proper person. Mr. Treasurer Boyle, afterwards Lord Carleton, was sent to prefer the request to the poet, who, as it will readily be believed, immediately undertook the duty. THE CAMPAIGN was written, and the successful bard became Commissioner of Appeals, and in 1706, Under-Secretary of State. There was much wisdom in this appointment. The aid of such a penman was not to be despised by any ministry, however powerful. The Present State of the War, an anonymous pamphlet, published in November, 1707, was credited to the new secretary. In 1709, our poet attended the Marquis of Wharton to Ireland as secretary. Whilst absent, Steele published the first number of The Tatler, April 12, 1709.

He soon became a most useful contributor to his friend's paper. He also contributed five articles to a political paper, The Whig Examiner, the first number of which appeared on the 14th September, 1710. The Tatler was brought to a close, January 2, 1711, and the first of the ensuing March, the Spectator made its appearance. This periodical, of which as many as 20,000 copies were sold in a day, still retains its popularity. Addison's contributions may be known by the signature C. L. I. or O., forming the word "Clio." The Guardian, commenced March 12, 1713, was also largely indebted to Addison. In 1713 appeared the celebrated tragedy of Cato, which was acted for thirty-five successive nights, notwithstanding Pope's opinion that it was not so well suited to the stage as it was to the closet. In this year was published a political squib of our author's, entitled The Trial and Conviction of Count Tariff. On the breaking out of the rebellion in 1715, Addison supported the government with great vigour in the Freeholder, which was published from September 23 to June 29, of the next year. His verses to Sir Godfrey Kneller, and a few other minor pieces, were given to the world about this time.

In 1716, he married the dowager Countess of Warwick: of this match Dr. Johnson remarks:—"This marriage, if uncontradicted report can be credited, made no addition to his happiness; it neither found nor made them equal. She always remembered her own rank, and thought herself entitled to treat with very little ceremony the tutor of her son." He breathed his last at Holland-house on the 17th June, 1719, when just entering the 48th year of his age. "Before he expired, he sent for his step-son, the Earl of Warwick, then in his 21st year, and while the young nobleman stood at his bedside to receive his commands, grasping his hand, he said he had called him that he might see with what peace a Christian could die. He left an only daughter by the countess."

Sir Richard Steele acknowledges himself indebted to Addison for a considerable part of his comedy of The Tender Husband, which appeared in 1704; and he is also known to be the author of the Drummer, or The Haunted House. Some papers in a continuation of The Spectator, which was attempted, but soon dropped, and one or two in a publication of a similar nature, entitled The Lover, were contributed by him during the years 1713 and 1714.

It is well known that Addison has always laboured under the suspicion, not only of envying his great literary rival, Pope, but also of exhibiting that envy in the most unjustifiable manner. We have not space to enter upon this question at length. How far he may have prompted the virulence of Philips and the slander of Gildon, is not likely to be satisfactorily ascertained at this late hour. We refer the curious reader to Sir William Blackstone's able paper in the Biographia Britannica, and to the article Addison, in Rose's New Biog. Dict. Blackstone, certainly a competent judge of evidence, considers that Addison's memory has been much calumniated, although he admits that the publication of Tickell's (?) version of the Iliad just at the moment of the appearance of Pope's translation was "indiscreet and ill-timed."

The literary merits of Addison have been discussed at length by Dr. Johnson in his Lives of the Poets. Perhaps we cannot better please and edify our readers than by quoting some opinions of the great critic, together with those of other authors, upon the writings and character of one who must always occupy the first rank in the list of English classics:

"If any judgment be made from his books, of his moral character, nothing will be found but purity and excellence. It is justly observed by Tickell, that he employed wit on the side of virtue and religion. He not only made the proper use of wit himself, but taught it to others, and from his time it has been generally subservient to the cause of reason and of truth. No greater felicity can genius attain than that of having purified intellectual pleasure, separated mirth from indecency, and wit from licentiousness; of having taught a succession of writers to bring elegance and gayety to the aid of goodness; and, if I may use expressions yet more awful, of having 'turned man to righteousness.'"

"His sentences have neither studied amplitude, nor affected brevity; his periods, though not diligently rounded, are voluble and easy. Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar, but not coarse, and elegant, but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the study of Addison."—Dr. Johnson.

"Mr. Addison wrote very fluently; but he was sometimes very slow and scrupulous in correcting. He would show his verses to several friends; and would alter almost every thing that any of them hinted as wrong. He seemed to be too diffident of himself; and too much concerned about his character as a poet; or (as he worded it) too solicitous for that kind of praise which is but a very little matter after all! Many of his Spectators he wrote very fast; and sent them to the press as soon as they were written. It seems to have been best for him not to have had too much time to correct. Addison was perfectly good company with intimates; and had something more charming in his conversation than I ever knew in any other man: but with any mixture of strangers, and sometimes only with one, he seemed to preserve his dignity much, with a stiff sort of silence."—Pope: Spence's Anecdotes.

"There is a grove at Magdalen College which retains the name of Addison's Walk, where still the student will linger. . . . Never, not even by Dryden, not even by Temple, had the English language been written with such sweetness, grace, and facility. But this was the smallest part of Addison's praise. Had he clothed his thoughts in the half-French style of Horace Walpole, or in the half-Latin style of Dr. Johnson, or in the half-German jargon of the present day, his genius would have triumphed over all faults of manner. As a moral satirist he stands unrivalled. If ever the best Tatlers and Spectators were equalled in their own kind, we should be inclined to guess that it must have been by the lost comedies of Menander. In wit, properly so called, Addison was not inferior to Cowley or Butler. No single ode of Cowley contains so many happy analogies as are crowded into the lines to Sir Godfrey Kneller; and we would undertake to collect from the Spectators as great a number of ingenious illustrations as can be found in 'Hudibras.' The still higher faculty of invention Addison possessed in still larger measure. . . . But what shall we say of Addison's humour? . . . We own that the humour of Addison is, in our opinion, of a more delicious flavour than the humour of either Swift or Voltaire."—T. B. MACAULAY.

"Pope's character of Addison is one of the truest, as well as one of the best, things he ever wrote. Addison deserved that character the most of any man. Yet how charming are his prose writings! He was as much a master of humour as he was an indifferent poet."—Dr. LOCKIER, Dean of Peterborough.

"Mr. Addison did not go any depth in the study of medals: all the knowledge he had of that kind, I believe he had from me; and I did not give him above twenty lessons upon that subject."—F.

"Mr. Addison would never alter any thing after a poem was once printed; and was ready to alter almost every thing that was found fault with before. I believe he did not leave a word unchanged that I might have any scruple against in his Cato."—P.

"The last line in that tragedy originally was—

'And, oh, 'twas this that ended Cato's life.'

Mr. Pope suggested the alteration as it stands at present:

'And robe the guilty world of Cato's life.'

Mr. Addison stayed about a year at Blois. He would rise as early as between two and three in the height of summer, and lie a-bed till between eleven and twelve in the depth of winter. He was untalkative while here, and often thoughtful: sometimes so lost in thought that I have come into his room, and stayed five minutes there, before he has known any thing of it."—Amaï PHILIPPEAUX OF BLOIS.

"The Spectators, though there are so many bad ones among them, make themselves read still. All Addison's are allowed to be good."—ABBÉ B.

"Old Jacob Tonson did not like Mr. Addison. He had a quarrel with him: and after his quitting the secretaryship went frequently to say of him, 'One day or other you'll see that man a bishop! I'm sure he looks that way; and, indeed, I ever thought him a priest in his heart.'—P.

"It was my fate to be much with the wits. My father was acquainted with all of them. Addison was the best company in the world."—LADY M. W. MONTAGU.

"Addison usually studied all the morning, then met his party at Button's; dined there, and stayed five or six hours, and sometimes far into the night. I was of the company for about a year, but found it was too much for me, and so I quitted it."—Pope: Spence's Anecdotes.

"To the keenest perception of the beautiful and sublime in composition, he added a taste pre-eminently delicate and correct, and the most engaging and fascinating style that this country had ever witnessed; with these were combined the most unrivalled humour, a morality lovely and interesting as it was pure and philanthropic, and a fancy whose effusions were peculiarly sweet, rich, and varied."—Dr. DRAKE.

Dr. Blair censures Addison for occasional redundancies, and gives some instances from Nos. 412 and 413 of the Spectator. He proceeds to remark:

"Although the free and flowing manner of such an author as Mr. Addison, and the graceful harmony of his periods, may palliate such negligences; yet, in general, it holds that style freed from this prolixity appears both more strong, and more beautiful. The attention becomes remiss, the mind falls into inaction, when words are multiplied without a corresponding multiplication of ideas."—Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres.

"When this man looks from the world whose weakness he describes so benevolently, up to the heaven which shines over us all, I can hardly fancy a human face lighted up with a more serene rapture; a human intellect thrilling with a purer love and adoration, than Joseph Addison's! Listen to him: from your childhood you have known the verses, but who can hear their sacred music without love and awe?

"Soon as the evening shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale," &c.

It seems to me those verses shine like the stars. They shine out of a great, deep calm. When he turns to heaven, a Sabbath comes over that man's mind: and his face lights up from it with a glory of thanks and prayer. . . . If Swift's life was the most wretched, I think Addison's was one of the most enviable. A life prosperous and beautiful—a calm death—an immense fame, and affection afterwards for his happy and spotless name."—Thackeray's English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century.

"We must remember that, however narrow, and prejudiced, and exclusive may seem to us the dogmas of Addison's literary criticisms, yet that these were the first popular essays in English towards the investigation of the grounds and axioms of æsthetic science, and that even here, in innumerable instances, (as, for example, in the celebrated reviews of Paradise Lost, and of the old national ballad of Chevy Chase), we find the author's natural and delicate sense of the beautiful and sublime triumphing over the accumulated errors and false judgment of his own artificial age, and the author of Cato doing unconscious homage to the nature and pathos of the rude old Border ballad-maker."—PROF. T. B. SHAW.

"In a word, one may justly apply to him what Plato, in his allegorical language, says of Aristophanes; that the Graces, having searched all the world for a temple wherein they might forever dwell, settled at last in the breast of Mr. Addison."—MELMOTH.

"Addison wrote little in verse, much in sweet, elegant, Virgilian prose; so let me call it, since Longinus calls Herodotus most Homæric; and Thucydides is said to have formed his style on Plautus. Addison's compositions are built with the finest materials, in the taste of the ancients. I never read him, but I am struck with such a disconcerting idea of perfection, that I drop my pen. And, indeed, far superior writers should forget his compositions, if they would be greatly pleased with their own."—DR. YOUNG.

"In refined and delicate humour Addison has no superior, if he has any equal, in English prose literature. . . . Who can set limits to the influence which such a mind has exerted? And what a lesson should it read to the conductors of our periodic press, from the stately quarterly to the daily newspaper! What untold gain would it be to the world if they would think less of party, and more of TRUTH: if they would ever be found the firm advocates of every thing that tends to elevate and bless man, and the steadfast, outspoken opponents of all that tends to degrade, debase, and brutalize him!"—PROF. C. D. CLEVELAND.

"In Addison the reader will find a rich but chaste vein of humour and satire; lessons of morality and religion, divested of all austerity and gloom; criticism at once pleasing and profound; and pictures of national character and manners that must ever charm from their vivacity and truth."—DR. HURD.

"Greater energy of character, or a more determined hatred of vice and tyranny, would have curtailed his usefulness as a public censor. He led the nation insensibly to a love of virtue and constitutional freedom, to a purer taste in morals and literature, and to the importance of those everlasting truths which so warmly engaged his heart and imagination."—ROBERT CHAMBERS.

"It is praise enough to say of a writer, that, in a high department of literature, in which many eminent writers have distinguished themselves, he has no equal; and this may, with strict justice, be said of Addison. He is entitled to be considered not only as the greatest of the English essayists, but as the forerunner of the great English novelists. His best essays approach near to absolute perfection; nor is their excellence more wonderful than their variety. His invention never seems to flag; nor is he ever under the necessity of repeating himself, or of wearing out a subject."—MACAULAY.

"He was not only the ornament of his age and country, but he reflects dignity on the nature of man. He has divested vice of its meretricious ornaments, and planted religion and virtue in the modest and graceful attire which charm and elevate the heart."—DR. ANDERSON.

"Of Addison's numerous and well-known writings, it may be affirmed that they rest on the solid basis of real excellence, in moral tendency as well as literary merit. Vice and folly are satirized, virtue and decorum are rendered attractive; and while polished diction and Attic wit abound, the purest ethics are inculcated."—MAURYER.

"As a writer, as a man, and as a Christian, the merit of Addison cannot be too highly extolled. His style has been always esteemed a model of excellence by men of taste. His humour has a charm which cannot be described; his philosophy is rational, and his morality is pure."—ATHENÆUM.

The Life of Addison, by Lucy Aikin, 2 vols., London, 1843, post 8vo, with Portrait.

"Miss Aikin has not left a stone unturned, that her monument to one of our most polished writers and complete minds may be fair, upright, and symmetrical. Her book contains the first complete life of Addison ever put forth. As a literary biography it is a model; and its pages are besides enriched by many hitherto unpublished letters of Addison."—LONDON ATHENÆUM.

In concluding our sketch of this eminent author, we may observe, that perhaps no English writer has been so fortunate as Addison in uniting so many discordant 'astes in a unanimous verdict of approbation. Browne has been thought pedantic, Johnson inflated, Taylor conceited, and Burke exuberant; but the graceful simplicity of Addison delights alike the rude taste of the uneducated, and the classic judgment of the learned. His exquisite humour charms our youth, and his affectionate admonitions impress upon our hearts those religious verities which can alone confer dignity upon age.

We subjoin a list of Addison's works: 1. Remarks on several parts of Italy in the years 1701, 1702, 1703, London, 1705, 1718, 1761. The same translated into Latin, under the title of Addisoni Epistola Missea ex Italia, ad illustrem Dominum Halifax, anno 1701. Auctore A. Murphy, 1799. 2. Campaign; a Poem with a Latin version. 3. Poems, 1712. 4. The Five Whig Examiners, 1712. 5. Cato; a tragedy, 1713. The same in Italian and French, 1715. In Latin, under the following title: Cato Tragedia, Auctore Clarissimo Viro Josepho Addison inter Angliæ nostræ Principes Poetas, jure nemerando, omissis Amotoriis Scenis. Latino Carmine Versa, 1763. This translation has been commended as "In general elegant, and executed with great spirit. The style approaches that of Seneca, the tragedian."

6. Essay concerning the Error in Distributing Modern Medals, 1715. 7. A Poem to the Princess of Wales; another to Sir Godfrey Kneller, 1716. 8. Freeholder, 1716. 9. The Drummer, or the Haunted House, 1716. 10. Freethinker, 1722. 11. Dissertations on the most celebrated Roman Poets; Englished by Charles Hayes, 1718. 12. Notes upon the Twelve Books of Paradise Lost, collected 1719. 13. Dialogues upon the Usefulness of Ancient Medals, especially in relation to the Latin and Greek poets, 1726. 14. Ode to Dr. Thomas Burnet, 1727. 15. Divine Poems, 1728. 16. On the Evidences of the Christian Religion, 1730. 17. Discourses on Ancient and Modern Learning.

His papers contributed to The Tatler, Spectator, Guardian, and Freeholder, together with his Treatise on the Christian Religion, were collected into 4 vols., Edinburgh, 1790. In the Tatler his papers have no signature; in the Spectator, as we have remarked, they are either C. L. I. or O. (Clio.) In the Guardian, they are marked by a hand.

Addison's works, portrait and plates, 4 vols. 4to. Baskerville's splendid edition, Birmingham, 1761.

"He who hath the Baskerville edition hath a good and even a glorious performance. It is pleasant (and, of course, profitable) to turn over the pages of these lovely tomes at one's Tusculum, on a day of oppression from heat or of confinement from rain."—DIBDIN.

Addison's Complete Works, the first complete edition ever published, including all of Bishop Hurd's edition, with numerous pieces now first collected, and copious notes, by Prof. G. W. Greene. A new issue, in 6 vols., 12mo, with Vignettes, &c., N. York, 1854; ed., with additions by H. G. Bohn, 6 vols.

"Nothing stamps the literary reading of the present day with a more exalted character than the fact of the profitable republishment of the old English classics. We congratulate the public upon having it in their power to purchase an edition of Addison's works, so complete as this promises to be, such an ornament to the library as it will prove, and edited with so much tact. To undertake to praise the writings of Joseph Addison is a work of supererogation. It is sufficient to say, that more persons have formed their style on his prose writings than on those of any other English writer."

Addison, Lancelot, D.D. 1632–1703, father of the preceding, was born at Crosby Ravensworth, in Westmoreland. He was the son of a clergyman, and adopted the same profession. He was noted at college for his acquirements. Not being in favour with the rulers of the day, he obtained no preferment until the Restoration. His first post was that of chaplain at Dunkirk. He was appointed king's chaplain in 1670. Dr. Addison wrote a number of works, which met with a moderate share of approbation. They relate principally to the early history of Mohammedanism, to the present state of the Jews, and to the sacraments of the Christian church, published 1671–98.

been commended as "a much esteemed and elegant collection." In 1775 he published A Specimen of the Medical Biography of Great Britain, which was sufficiently approved to induce him to prepare a volume of Biographical Memoirs of Medicine in Great Britain, from the revival of Literature to the time of Hervey, London, 1780. About the year 1792, in conjunction with his sister, he commenced the Evenings at Home, completed in 6 volumes in 1796. Almost the whole of the matter was the production of the doctor's pen.

"These little books are too well known to require any comment: and they have led the way to many others of a similar nature, and been translated into almost every European language."

He next published the Letters from a Father to a Son. From 1796-1807 he was literary editor of the Monthly Magazine. In January, 1807, he started the Athenaeum, which was discontinued in 1809. He commenced, in 1796, a General Biography, in which Mr. Nicholson, Drs. Enfield and Morgan, and others, assisted him. This work extended to ten quarto volumes, and was published 1799-1815, having employed the doctor nearly twenty years; yet time was found by him for various other literary works.—Roscoe's New Biog. Dict. Widely different opinions have been entertained as to the merit of Aikin's Biographical Dictionary. Mr. Gifford calls it a "worthless compilation," whilst Roscoe, in his Life of Leo X., praises it as "a work which does not implicitly adopt prescriptive errors, but evinces a sound judgment, a manly freedom of sentiment, and a correct taste." Here is a vast difference of opinion! We find some reference to this work in Mr. Southey's Correspondence:

"Did I tell you," he writes to his brother, "that I have promised to supply the lives of the Spanish and Portuguese authors in the remaining volumes of Dr. Aikin's great General Biography?" In 1807, he tells Longman & Co., "At Dr. Aikin's request, I have undertaken (long since) the Spanish and Portuguese literary part of his biography. Some articles appeared in the last volume, and few as they are, I suppose they entitle me to it. Will you ask Dr. A. if this be the case?"

From 1811-15, he edited Dodsley's Annual Register. In 1820, his last publication, the Select Works of the British Poets, (Johnson to Beattie), made its appearance. A continuation of the series by other hands has been published. Dr. Aikin died December 7, 1822. He was emphatically a literary man. Dr. Watt gives a list of about fifty publications of this industrious and useful writer.

Aikin, Lucy, daughter of the preceding, authoress of several historical and other works. Epistles. Juvenile Correspondence. Memoirs of the Court of James I., Lon., 1822, 2 vols. 8vo.

"An admirable historical work, nearly as entertaining as a novel, and far more instructive than most histories."—Edinburgh Review.

Miss Aikin has also given to the world, Mem. of the Court of Queen Eliz., 1818, 2 vols. 8vo.; of the Court of Charles I., 1833, 2 vols. 8vo.; Life of Addison, 1843, 2 vols. 8vo.

Ailmer, John. See AYLMER.

Ailred of Rievaulx, 1109-1166. The name of this eminent writer, which was properly Ethelred, is variously spelt in old manuscripts, Ailred, Aelred, Alred, Ealred, Alured, &c. Ailred, the most usual form, appears to be merely a north-country abbreviation of Ethelred. He was born in 1109, and was educated in company with Henry, son of David, King of Scotland, whose friendship, as well as that of his father, he continued long to enjoy; and the latter would have raised him to a bishopric, but he preferred entering himself as a Cistercian monk in the Abbey of Rievaulx, in the North Riding of Yorkshire. Here his virtues and abilities were soon acknowledged by his fellow-monks, and he was made master of the novices. His monkish biographer tells us that his extraordinary sanctity was exhibited by miracles which he performed almost in his childhood. After remaining some time at Rievaulx, Ailred was removed to be made abbot of the monastery of Beveshy in Lincolnshire, which was a more recent foundation of the Cistercian order. He died on the 12th of January, 1166, at the age of fifty-seven. As an historical writer, Ailred has little importance in comparison even with the ordinary chroniclers of his age, for he too generally prefers improbable legends to sober truth. His historical works are not very numerous. They consist of, 1. The Life of Edward the Confessor, which has been frequently printed. 2. An account of the Battle of the Standard, printed by Twysden. 3. A work entitled in the old catalogue of Rievaulx, De Generositate et Moribus et Morte regis David, which also has been printed by Twysden, who gives it the title Genealogia regum Anglorum. This book, dedicated to Henry II. before his accession to the throne, begins with an account of David, King of Scotland, which is followed by a brief history of the Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman kings. The old bibliographers have made more than one book out of this tract. 4. The Life of St. Margaret, Queen of Scotland, which is only preserved in an abridged form. 5. The Story of a Nun of Watton in Yorkshire, who was seduced and afterwards repented. 6, 7. The early catalogue of the library of Rievaulx, printed in the Reliquiæ Antiquæ, enumerates, among Ailred's writings, a Vita Sancti Niniani Episcopi, and a treatise De Miraculis Hagustaldensis Ecclesiæ. The Life of St. Ninianus was formerly in MS., Cotton. Tiberius D. 3, now nearly destroyed. The Miracles of the Church of Hexham are preserved in the Bodleian Library. John of Peterborough, under the date 1153, observes, "Here ends the chronicle of Ailred." Ailred's theological writings are more numerous, and consist of, 8. Thirty-three homilies or sermons, De Onere Babylonis, on the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth chapters of Isaiah, addressed to Gilbert, Bishop of London, and therefore written after 1161. 9. The Speculum, or Mirror of Divine Love. 10. A Compendium Speculi Charitatis. 11. A dialogue De Spiritualibus Amicitia, the plan of which arose from the perusal of the treatise De Amicitia of Cicero. 12. A tract on the words of the evangelist, Cum factus esset Jesus annorum duodecimo anno Christi, which is sometimes entitled De duodecimo anno Christi. This work, and the four preceding, were collected and printed at Douai early in the seventeenth century, by Richard Gibbons, a Jesuit, and were reprinted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. 13. Liber de Institutione Inclusionum, or the Rule of Nuns. This, being found without the name of the author, was printed among the works of St. Augustine, but it was given under Ailred's name in the collection of monastic rules published by Lucas Holstenius. It is enumerated among Ailred's works in the early catalogue of the Rievaulx library. 14. He wrote a considerable number of homilies and sermons, some of which have been printed. Thirty-two of his sermons are intermixed with those of St. Bernard in a manuscript at Lambeth, and twenty-five inedited sermons of the same writer were printed in the Bibliotheca Cisterciensium. 15. A large collection of epistles by Ailred appear to be entirely lost. 16. His dialogue De Natura Animæ is preserved in the Bodleian Library, MS. Bodl. Mus. 52. 17. The old catalogue of Rievaulx mentions a work by Ailred, entitled Fasciculus Frondium.

His rhythmical prose in honour of St. Cuthbert, as well as his "Epitaph on the Kings of Scotland," is lost, unless the latter be the prosaic Chronicon Rhythmicum printed at the end of the Chronicon of Mailros, in the edition by Mr. Stevenson. Among the manuscripts of Caius College, Cambridge, according to Tanner, there is a version of the Life of St. Edward in Leonine Latin Elegiacs, ascribed to Ailred, and commencing with the line,—

Cum tibi, Laurenti, egor parere jubenti.

On account of this poem, Leyser admits Ailred into his list of mediæval Latin poets.—Abbreviated from Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Ainsworth, Henry, D.D., d. 1662, date and place of birth unknown. He became a Brownist in 1590, and suffered in the persecutions which that sect endured. He found a refuge in Holland, where he laboured with Mr. Johnson in raising a church at Amsterdam, and in compiling A Confession of Faith of the People called Brownists. He was noted, even in his youth, for his knowledge of the learned languages, especially for his skill in the Hebrew tongue. He applied himself with great diligence to the study of the Rabbins, and is thought to have owed his death to his zeal for the conversion of the Jews. Having found a diamond of great value, he restored it to its owner, a Jew, who begged him to accept a reward. Ainsworth stipulated for an opportunity of a disputation with some of the Rabbis upon the Old Testament prophecies relating to the Messiah. The Jew acceded to his request, but unable or unwilling to perform his promise, had the zealous divine poisoned, thus evincing the odium theologum to a remarkable degree. Narrations of this character are to be received with great caution. His Annotations on the Psalms were printed in 1612, 4to; on the Pentateuch, 2 vols. 4to, 1621; and (folio) in 1627 and 1639. His treatise, A Counter-Poison against Bernard and Crashaw, 1608, excited much attention, and was answered by Bishop Hall. Few authors have been more quoted by learned men of various countries than Dr. Ainsworth. Walch observes of his Commentaries on the Psalms, "Monstrant ista eruditionem non medicorum ac merito laudantur." In 1690, the work was translated into Dutch, and Poole has incorporated the substance of it in his Latin synopsis.

Dr. Doddridge and Dr. Adam Clarke express a high opinion of the value of the Annotations.

Ainsworth, Robert, 1660-1743, well known as the author of a work which many profit by at first against their will—the Dictionary of the Latin Tongue. Mr. Ainsworth was born at Woodyale near Manchester. His Dictionary cost him twenty years' labour, and was first published in 1736. It was dedicated to that eminent scholar, one of the brightest ornaments of the medical profession, Dr. Richard Mead, of whom we shall have more to say in his place. Of the Dictionary, there have been improved editions by Patrick, Ward, Young, Carey, &c. This work was far better than any that preceded it. Since its publication the treasures of the Latin tongue have been greatly developed by classical scholars in Germany and elsewhere. The lexicons of Gesner, Fascioli, Sheller, Georges, and Freund are of inestimable value to the student. The Wörterbuch der Lateinischen Sprache of Dr. Wilhelm Freund was published in Leipzig in four volumes, containing 4500 pages, in the following order: vol. I. (A—C) in 1834; vol. IV. (R—Z) in 1840; vol. II. (D—K) in 1844; and vol. III. (L—Q) in 1845. Upon the basis of this work Dr. E. A. Andrews's Lexicon is founded.

Ainsworth, W. Harrison, novelist, b. 1805, and intended for the law. In 1826, he pub. a novel, John Cheverton, which was commended by Sir Walter Scott. In 1834, Rookwood appeared, followed (after pub. of Crichton) by another bad book of the same class, Jack Sheppard. Works of this mischievous character might be very appropriately published as a series, under the title of the "Tyburn Plutarch." We are glad that the author has struck upon a better vein in his later works of fiction. The Tower of London, Old Saint Paul's, Windor Castle, and St. James's Palace, are thought much more creditable to the novelist than the works above censured. Mr. Ainsworth resides in the neighbourhood of Kilburn; he edits the New Monthly, and the magazine which bears his name.

"A most curious, instructive, and excellent botanical work, which for scientific arrangement and execution has never been surpassed."—LOWNDEN.

Aiton, William T., son of the former, and succeeded him as gardener to the king. He published a new edition of Hortus Kewensis, (also an epitome of the same,) and some other horticultural works.

Akenside, Mark, M.D., 1721-1770, was born November 9, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. His father, a butcher of that place, intended him for the ministry among the Dissenters, and he was accordingly sent to the University of Edinburgh, where he remained three years. Preferring the study of physic to that of divinity, he returned a sum he had received for the prosecution of his studies, and took up his residence at Leyden, where, after three years' application, he took his degree of M.D., May 16, 1744. In the same year he published his Pleasures of the Imagination.

"I have heard Dodsley, by whom it was published, relate, that when the copy was offered him, the price demanded for it, which was a hundred and twenty pounds, being such as he was not inclined to give precipitately, he carried the work to Pope, who, having looked into it, advised him not to make a niggardly offer; for 'this was no every-day writer.'"—DR. JOHNSON.

The poem was well received; and its circulation not injured by an attack from Warburton, elicited by Akenside's having adopted Shaftesbury's assertion respecting ridicule as a test of truth. Jeremiah Dyson took up the cudgels for Akenside, and thus the young author "awoke and found himself famous." The Epistle to Curio was his next publication. This was an attack upon Pulteney, Earl of Bath, upon political grounds. Different opinions, of course, were expressed of the merits of this epistle.

"A very acrimonious epistle."—DR. JOHNSON.

"Impressive, moral, and sensible production."—Hutchinson's Biographia Medica.

In 1745 he published his first collection of odes, and soon after commenced the practice of medicine at Northampton, which he quitted for Hampstead, and in two years and a half for London. His generous friend, Mr. Dyson, who had before drawn his pen on his behalf, now generously drew his purse, and made him the handsome allowance of £300 per annum. In June, 1751, the Royal College of Physicians associated him as a licentiate, and in April, 1754, he was elected a Fellow of the College, having received a doctor's degree the preceding year by mandamus at Cambridge. In 1759 he received the appointment of assistant physician to St. Thomas's Hospital, and was shortly after made one of the physicians to the queen. He was selected by the College of Physicians to deliver the Guelstonian lectures in 1755, and the Croonian in 1756. Akenside was obtaining considerable eminence, when he was attacked by a putrid fever, which proved fatal on the 23d of June, 1770, in his 49th year. We should not omit to mention that his thesis upon taking his degree of M.D. at Leyden, entitled De Ortū et Incremento Fœtus Humani, took new grounds upon the subject, which experience has since confirmed.

In his professional conduct to the indigent patients placed under his charge, Akenside cannot be too much blamed. Dr. Lettsom, a pupil at the hospital, tells some unpleasant truths respecting this matter, which the biographer would gladly spare. He was "Supercilious and unfeeling. If the poor affrighted patients did not return a direct answer to his queries, he would instantly discharge them from the hospital; he evinced a particular disgust to females, and generally treated them with harshness. One leg of Akenside was considerably shorter than the other, which obliged him to wear a false heel. He had a pale, strumous countenance, but was always very neat and elegant in his dress. He wore a large white wig, and carried a long sword."

We are told that sometimes he would order some of the attendants on his visiting days to precede him with brooms to clear the way, and prevent too near an approach of the patients. Biography is a faithful friend to the race, when obliged to register the faults and follies of genius. The living are thus taught circumspection in their "walk and conversation." How little did Akenside suppose that a century hence thousands who admired the poet, would be forced to detest the physician, and despise the fop! The pride of Akenside, and his rough treatment of his indigent patients, are the more striking when we consider that he himself was a pensioner of the generous Jeremiah Dyson. His lofty pretension, too, was suicidal to his pride, as it was a continual remembrance of his obscure parentage:—obscure, but no subject for shame. As a son of a butcher, he was perfectly respectable; when aping fashion and rank, he was supremely ridiculous. Rochefoucauld truly says that "we are never ridiculous for what we are, but only for what we pretend to be."

We turn to a more agreeable theme. The Pleasures of the Imagination has been deservedly commended for all the excellencies of style, language, and illustration which constitute a poem of the first order. Dr. Johnson speaks of it as raising expectations that were not very amply satisfied:

"It has, undoubtedly, a just claim to very particular notice, as an example of great felicity of genius, and uncommon amplitude of acquisitions; of a young mind stored with images, and much exercised in combining and comparing them. . . . The subject is well chosen, as it includes all images that can strike or please, and thus comprises every species of poetical delight."

"As I know that Akenside's work on the Pleasures of Imagination is deservedly one of your most favourite poems, I send you enclosed what, I have no doubt, you will set a due value upon—no less than a copy of all the corrections he made with his own hand on the poem. They were inserted in the margin of his printed copy, which afterwards passed into the hands of a gentleman, from a friend of whom, and of my own, a very ingenious young Templar, I received them."—PINKERTON: Heron's Letters.

These marginal alterations were published by Mr. Pinkerton.

"Had Akenside completed his plan, his poem would have lost as much in poetry as it would have gained in philosophy."—DR. AITON.

Akenside intended to revise and enlarge this poem, but he died before his intention was fulfilled.

"His periods are long but harmonious, the cadences fall with grace, and the measure is supported with dignity."

Johnson declares that

"Of his odes nothing favourable can be said; the sentiments commonly want force, nature, or novelty; the diction is sometimes harsh and uncouth," &c.

Yet when Mr. Elliott (father of Lord Minto) was commended for his eloquent speech in support of the Scotch militia, he exclaimed,

"If I was above myself, I can account for it; for I had been animated by the sublime ode of Dr. Akenside."

Gray censures the tone of false philosophy which is to be observed in the Pleasures of the Imagination:

"The pleasures which this poem professes to treat of, proceed either from natural objects, as from a flourishing grove, a clear and murmuring fountain, a calm sea by moonlight, or from works of art, such as a noble edifice, a musical tune, a statue, a picture, a poem."

Dr. Dibdin denominates Akenside

"The most perfect builder of our blank verse. Why are his Pleasures of the Imagination so little perused? There are a hundred (I had wellnigh said a thousand) electrical passages in this charming poem."

"Akenside's picture of man is grand and beautiful, but unfinished. The immortality of the soul, which is the natural consequence of the appetites and powers she is invested with, is scarcely once hinted throughout the poem."—WALKER.

"If his genius is to be estimated from this poem, it will be found to be lofty and elegant, chaste, correct, and classical."—MRS. BARBAULD.

"In his poem, as an elegant critic has observed with great propriety, he has united the grace of Virgil, the colouring of Milton, the incidental expression of Shakespeare, to paint the finest features of the human mind, and the most lovely forms of true morality and religion."—Buck's Life of Akenside.

"Akenside's Pleasures of the Imagination is a very brilliant and pleasing production. Every page shows the refined taste and cultivated mind of the author. That it can strictly be called a work of genius, I am not prepared to admit. . . . His Hymns and Odes have long since fallen into oblivion, and I do not feel inclined to disturb their rest. His Inscriptions, however, have an attic terseness and force, which are unequalled by any productions of the same class in our language, excepting, perhaps, a few by our contemporary, Southey."—Noble's Lectures on English Poetry.

Campbell remarks:

"The sweetness which we miss in Akenside is that which should arise from the direct representations of life, and its warm realities and affections. We seem to pass in his poem through a gallery of pictured abstractions, rather than of pictured things."

"If any young man of genius, classical learning, and poetical ardour, would present the world with a Greek translation of Akenside's Hymn to the Nalade, and submit it to the correction of an experienced Greek scholar before publication, he might establish a learned and honourable reputation for himself, and add another composition worthy of Homer or Callimachus. Ne liceat magnas Grælorum implere catervas."—Pursuits of Literature.

"Boswell: 'Akenside's distinguished poem is his Pleasures of Imagination; but for my part, I never could admire it so much as most people do.' JOHNSON: 'Sir, I could not read it through.' BOSWELL: 'I have read it through; but I did not find any great power in it.'"

But on another occasion Johnson gave it as his opinion that Akenside was a poet superior to both Gray and Ma-son. Boswell tells us that

"When Akenside's Pleasures of Imagination first came out, he did not put his name to the poem. Rolt went over to Dublin, published an edition of it, and put his own name to it. Upon the fame of this he lived for several months, being entertained at the best tables, as the ingenious Mr. Rolt."

We need hardly inform those conversant with literary history that this story has been refuted. We shall excite a smile from our reader, when we beg him to remember that bigoted worshipper of the Greeks and Romans, that getter-up of that renowned "dinner after the manner of the ancients,"—the inimitable physician in Peregrine Pickle! The original of this mirth-compelling son of Æsculapius was no less a person than our pompous friend—Doctor Akenside. Tobias Smollett was a rare hand at a portrait! Mr. D'Israeli rates Dr. S. soundly for thus "taking off" his brother of the lancet and bolus:

"Plagued with Akenside, for some reflections against Scotland, Smollett has exhibited a man of great genius and virtue as a most ludicrous personage; and who can discriminate, in the ridiculous physician in Peregrine Pickle, what is real from what is fictitious?"—Observations of Authors.

In speaking of Akenside as a physician, we have already given him credit for the new, yet legitimate, ground assumed by his thesis De Ortu et Incremento, &c.

"His principal medical work, De Dysenteria Commentarius, has been commended, and is still to be valued, for the elegance of its Latinity. Pathology has made great advances since the time of Akenside, and the distinction between inflammation of the serous, muscular, and mucous textures, are now better understood. The treatment of dysentery depends upon the condition of those structures, and Akenside's book is therefore no longer sought after but as a specimen of elegant composition."

Alabaster, Wm., D.D., flourished in the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th century. He was born in Suffolk, educated at Cambridge, and afterwards incorporated of the University of Oxford. He attended Robert, Earl of Essex, as chaplain in the Cadiz voyage, where he became a Roman Catholic, and published Seven Motives for his Conversion, answered by Baister, 1598, and by Fenton, 1599; but it has been observed that he discovered more for returning to the Church of England. He published Commentarius de certa Apocalypica, London, 1621; Lexicon Pentaglotton Hebraicum, Chaldaicum, Syriacum, &c., 1637; and several other works. Anthony Wood is loud in his praises:

"He was the rarest poet and Grecian that any one age or nation ever produced. He hath written Roxana, Tragedy, admirably well acted more than once in Trin. Coll. Hall in Cambr., and was soon after published, full of faults, contrary to the author's mind: whereupon he took great pains to correct and amend it."—Athenæ Oxonienses.

Dr. Johnson commends Roxana "as a composition equal to the Latin poetry of Milton; and Richard Herrick, the poet, in his Hesperides, doth highly celebrate Alabaster for his elaborate works. He died about 1640, and was buried according to the discretion of his dear friend, Nich. Bacon of Grey's Inn."

Alan De Lynn, flourished about 1420; was born at Lynn, Norfolk. He applied himself to theology and philosophy at Cambridge, where he took the degree of doctor. He was a preacher of note, and left many works, a list of which will be found in Tanner. Let it be recorded to his credit, for all time, that he was a famous hand at those invaluable literary charts—indexes. May his example be ever honoured by laudable imitation!

Alan, Allen, or Allyn, William, 1532-1594, cardinal of the Church of Rome. His name occurs as one of the translators of the New Testament, Rheims, 1582. He was the author of a number of works, principally in defence of his church, of which he was so zealous an advocate that he used his influence to persuade Philip of Spain to invade England. Indeed, he wrote two books to prove the efficacy of the Bull of Sixtus V., by which he contended that the queen was accursed and deprived of her crown, and her subjects no longer bound to allegiance. Fuller says:

"Hear what different characters two authors of several persuasions bestow upon him. 'He was somewhat above an ordinary man in stature, comely of countenance, composed in his gait, affable in all meetings, and, for the gifts of his mind, pious, learned, prudent, grave, and though of great authority, humble, modest, meek, patient, peaceable; in a word, beautiful and adorned with all kinds of virtues.'—Pits de Angliæ Scriptoribus, p. 792. Look first upon this picture; then on this: 'He was the last of our English cardinals in time, and first in wickedness; deserving not to be counted among Englishmen, who, as another Herodotus, to achieve himself a name amongst the grandees of earth, endeavoured to fire the Church of England, the noblest (without envy be it spoken) in the Christian world; so that his memory deserveth to be buried in oblivion.' Godwin, in his Catalogue of Cardinals: 'Let them say what they please, certain it is, he was an active man, and of great parts and prudence.'—ANTHONY WOOD.

Aland, John Fortescue, first Baron Fortescue of Credan, 1670-1746, descended from the famous Sir John Fortescue, Chancellor of England in the reign of Henry VI. A collection of reports taken by him, and called by his name, was published in 1743.

"So highly were his literary attainments esteemed, and his judicial merits appreciated, that the University of Oxford conferred on him by diploma, in 1733, the degree of civil law."

Aland was a friend of that eminent Saxon scholar, William Elstob; and in the preface to his Book of Absolute and Unlimited Monarchy, he gives an account of Elstob's project of compiling a very valuable edition of all the Saxon laws, both in print and MSS. This design was cut short by Elstob's death. See Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, vol. iv. pp. 117, 120.

Alanus de Insulis, of the 12th century, called Doctor Universalis, is supposed to have been an Englishman, as well from other circumstances as from the notice of Joseph of Exeter's poem on the Trojan war—

"Illic pannoso plebeoact carmine nodos—Ennius, et priami fortunas intonat."

In addition to the Anti-Claudianus, he was the author of numerous works in prose and verse. See Histoire Littéraire de France. His contemporary of the same name (called "Senior," for distinction) was a native of Lille, in Flanders.

Albericus de Vere, a canon of St. Osyth's, in Essex, contemporary with Richard, wrote a life of St. Osyth. Dugdale makes him the second son of the second Alberic de Vere, Earl of Oxford, who died early in the reign of Stephen. A life of St. Osyth, printed in the collection of Surin, is supposed to be the work of Alberic; but its brevity renders it more probable that it is a mere abridgment of it. Bale and Pits also attribute to him a history of his monastery, (which Tanner supposes to have been only a part of the life of St. Oyth,) and a treatise on the Eucharist.—Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Alcuin, 735-804. The last of the distinguished Anglo-Saxons, whose name shed lustre on the empire of the Frankish monarchs in the eighth century, was Alcuin. There is only one early life of Alcuin, which is anonymous, and was written in 829, by a person who obtained much of his information from Sigulf, Alcuin's friend and disciple: it is printed in the editions of Alcuin's works, in the Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. of Mabillon, in the collection of Surius, and in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists. The richest source of information relating to his history is his Epistles. Much has been written concerning Alcuin in modern times; a sketch of his life is given by Mabillon; a more extensive life was composed in Latin by the prince-Abbot Frobenius, and prefixed to his edition of his works. More recently Alcuin's life has been published by Dr. Frederick Lorenz, Professor of History at the University of Halle, (1829), translated into English by Jane Mary Slee, (am. 8vo, London, 1837.) Born at York about the year 735, of a noble family, Alcuin was scarcely weaned from his mother's breast when he was dedicated to the church, and intrusted to the care of the inmates of the monastery; and on reaching the proper age he was placed in the school of Archbishop Egbert, then celebrated for the number of noble youths who crowded thither to imbibe instruction from the lips of that prelate. Alcuin was distinguished above his fellows by his application to the study of the sciences, which were taught by Egbert's kinsman, Aelbert, who succeeded him in 786 in the see of York, and in the management of the school. Alcuin was Aelbert's favourite pupil; when about twenty years of age he was chosen to accompany him on a visit to the Continent in search of books and of new discoveries in science, and on that occasion he resided a short time at Rome. In 781, Alcuin visited Parma, on his return from Rome, and there met with Charlemagne, who had also been at Rome. That monarch was then meditating the foundation of scholastic institutions throughout his dominions, and being well informed of Alcuin's great reputation for learning, if not already personally acquainted with him, he invited him to settle in France, and to become his adviser and assistant in his projects of reform. Alcuin readily complied with the king's desires; but he continued his journey home to fulfil his original commission, and to obtain the consent of the Archbishop of York and the King of Northumbria (Alfwold) to the proposed arrangement. With the approbation of his spiritual and temporal superiors, having chosen some of his own pupils as companions, he returned to France in the year 782.

The position of Alcuin at the court of Charlemagne during his first residence in France has been compared and contrasted with that of Voltaire and other learned foreigners, who were patronized by Frederick the Great. Without holding any actual employment, he lived as the friend and counsellor of the Frankish monarch, was the companion of his private hours, which were spent in discussing questions of theology and science, and acted as the instructor of his children. After remaining about eight years in France, he resolved to return to York. Charlemagne begged him to come back speedily, and make the court of France his lasting home; a request to which Alcuin was willing to consent, if he could make it consistent with his duties to his native country. "Although," he said, "I possess no small inheritance in my own country, I will willingly resign it, and in poverty serve thee; let it be thy care to obtain the permission of my king and my bishop." Alcuin came to England in the year 790, as ambassador from Charlemagne to King Offa, to arrange some misunderstanding which had arisen between these two great monarchs. From 792 to 796 Alcuin continued to reside at the court of Charlemagne, in the same relation to his patron as before his visit to England. His position was rendered agreeable, not only by the favour of the royal family, but by the society of a circle of learned friends; yet his happiness was frequently interrupted by grief at the troubles with which his native country was visited.

Alcuin's letter to the monks who had escaped from the massacre at Lindisfarne will serve as a specimen of his epistolary style. We give some extracts:

Alden, Joseph, D.D., LL.D., b. 1807, in Green county, N.Y.; grad. at Union College, N.Y., 1828; received the degree of D.D. from the same institution, 1838, and that of LL.D. from Columbia College, N.Y., 1857. He pursued his theological studies at Princeton, N.J.; was for two years a tutor in Nassau Hall; was for many years Professor of Rhetoric in Williams Coll., Mass.; Prof. of Moral Philosophy in Lafayette Coll., Pa. In Jan. 1857, he became President of Jefferson Coll., Pa. Dr. Alden has confined his efforts as a writer chiefly to the department of Sunday-school literature. Among his numerous works for the young may be mentioned The Example of Washington, The Patriot's Fireside, Religion in Fashionable Life, &c. At one time editor of the New York Observer, and has been a large contributor to its columns. He is engaged [1858] in the preparation of a text-book on Intellectual Philosophy.

Aldhelm. We shall meet with more than one great scholar formed by the teaching of Theodore and Adrian. The most celebrated of these was Aldhelm, a scion of the illustrious family of the West-Saxon kings. Aldhelm was born in Wessex; but the date of his birth is uncertain, although it may be placed with sufficient probability about the year 656. Aldhelm was not a voluminous writer. The works which alone have given celebrity to his name are his two treatises on Virginitas and his Enigmata. The prose treatise De Laude Virginitatis continued to be a favourite book with our Anglo-Saxon forefathers up to the time of the Norman Conquest, and numerous early manuscripts of it are still preserved. Aldhelm's Latin compositions have been frequently cited as an example of the false style of the early Anglo-Latin writers. Even as far back as the 12th century, William of Malmesbury felt himself obliged to offer an apology for him, grounded on the taste of the age in which he lived. His writings are on the one hand filled with Latinized Greek words, and with awkward expressions that render them obscure; while on the other they abound in the alliterations and metaphorical language which characterized his native tongue. Aldhelm's prose is much less pleasing than his verse, because it is far less harmonious.

Aldred, died about 1069, an Anglo-Saxon prelate. Tanner gives him credit, perhaps without much probability, for two works: 1. Pro Edgardo Rege contra Tyrannidem Normannorum, lib. l. 2. Epistolæ ad Exiles, lib. l.

Aldrich, Henry, D.D., 1647-1710, of Christ Church, Oxford. He was eminent as a controversialist, (in opposition to Popery,) as an architect, and as a musician. His principal works were, 1. Reply to Two Discourses concern- ing the Adoration of our B. Saviour in the Holy Eucharist, Oxford, 1687-88. 2. Artis Logicæ Compendium, Oxford, 1692, 1696, 1704, 1750. 3. Elementa Architecturæ Civilis ad Vitruvii Veterumque Disciplinam et recentiorum præsertim ad Paladii exempta probatoria concinnata, Oxf., 1789. In his first character—as a disputant—Burnet places him among the more distinguished divines “who managed and directed this controversial war.”

Aldrich, James, 1810-1856, an American poet and journalist, b. near the Hudson, in the county of Suffolk. He received his education partly in Orange county, and partly in the city of New York, where, early in life, he relinquished the occupation of a merchant and devoted his attention entirely to literature. Edited two or three popular periodicals. See specimens of his poetry in Griswold's Poets and Poetry of America. In the words of his physician, Dr. Kissam,

“He not only wrote poetry, but lived the life of a true poet.”

Aldrich, or Aldridge, Robert, died 1555-1556, was Bishop of Carlisle in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary. He was a friend of Leland's, and corresponded with Erasmus. 1. Epistola ad Gulielmum Hormanum. 2. Epigrammata varia. 3. Several Resolutions concerning the Sacraments. 4. Answers to certain Queries concerning the abuses of the Mass.—Biog. Brit.

Aldrich, Thomas Bailey, b. 1836, Portsmouth, N.H., Asst. Ed. Home Journal, N. York, a poet of much promise. 1. Miscellaneous Poems, 12mo. 2. The Course of True Love never did run Smooth, 1858, N. York, 12mo.

“This piquant little volume, by the author of ‘Babbie Bell,’ tells of the haps and mishaps of two Eastern lovers whom a whimsical old caliph endeavors to keep apart, and illustrates, in most delicious verse, the truth of Shakespeare's line,

“The course of true love never did run smooth.”

Alen, or Allen, Edmond, died about 1559, was a native of Norfolk. Strype praises him as a great proficient in Greek and Latin, an eminent Protestant divine, and a learned minister of the gospel. He wrote a number of theological works, and translated some into English.

Ales, or Alesius, Alexander, 1500-1565, born at Edinburgh, a divine of the Confession of Augsburg. Patrick Hamilton, the first Scotch martyr, was the means of his conversion to the doctrines of the Reformation. He wrote a number of theological works, and translated Edward VI.'s first Liturgy for the benefit of Bucer.

Ales. See ALEXANDER DE HALES.

Alexander, Archibald, D.D., 1772-1851, was a native of Rockbridge county, Virginia. He was educated at Hampden Sydney College, and studied theology with Rev. Mr. Graham. He was licensed to preach October 1, 1791, ordained by the Presbytery of Hanover, June 9, 1794, and for some years was a pastor in Charlotte and Prince Edward. He was chosen President of Hampden Sydney College in 1796, pastor of the 3d Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia in 1807, and first Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology of the Princeton (New Jersey) Theological Seminary on its establishment in 1812, which office he retained until his death in 1851. Dr. Alexander's character was most exemplary in all the relations of life. His principal works are, Evidences of Revealed Religion; On the Canon of Scripture; Christian Experience; History of African Colonization; History of the Israelites; Annals of the Jewish Nation; Advice to a Young Christian; Bible Dictionary; Counsels from the Aged to the Young; Thoughts on Religious Experience; History of the Log College.

“Professor Alexander published his very useful volume on the Canon of Scripture, as a supplement to a treatise on the Evidences of the Christian Religion, which has been very favourably received in North America. This treatise on the Canon is avowedly compiled from the previous labours of the most eminent critics, especially Bishop Cosin's Scholastic History of the Canon of the Old Testament, and the ample collections of the impartial and indefatigable Dr. Lardner, and the learned Jeremiah Jones. The first part of Dr. Alexander's treatise discusses the Canon of the Old Testament; in the second part are considered the Canon of the New Testament, and the reasons for which the Apocryphal books are deservedly rejected from the Sacred Canon. To divines and students (especially in North America) who may not have access to numerous and more costly works, this treatise is a very useful and acceptable present.”—Horne's Introduction.

This work was published, Princeton, 1826, 12mo, London, 1828, 12mo. A new ed. was published, Lond., 1833, 12mo, with introductory remarks by John Morison, D.D.

“A useful Treatise on the Canon.”—BUCKLEY.

“Morison's preface is well worthy of a perusal. . . . The ‘Evidences of Christianity’ is a masterly performance.”—LOWDES.

After Dr. Alexander's decease, there was pub. from his MS. a work entitled Outlines of Moral Science, 1852.

"Though not aspiring to the dignity of a treatise, it forms a most compact and convenient text-book. . . . The author has had a clear perception of the limits of his subject, and has not aimed at making it a manual of 'the whole duty of man.' . . . It is a calm, clear stream of abstract reasoning, flowing from a thoughtful, well-instructed mind, without any parade of logic, but with an intuitive simplicity and directness which gives an almost axiomatic force. From this characteristic we could almost have conjectured what is stated in the preface, that the study of ethical philosophy was the author's favourite pursuit for at least threescore years, and that for forty years it formed a branch of academic instruction in connection with his theological course."—*Westm. Alexander, Wm., Earl of Stirling, 1580-1640, commenced to be an author at the early age of fourteen. He was born at Menstrie, Scotland, and was a descendant of the family of Macdonald. James I. and Charles I. were both much attached to him. The first gave him a grant of Nova Scotia in 1621, which charter has since been the cause of considerable discussion. In his Aurora he presented the public with more than a hundred sonnets, songs, and elegies, as a poetical display of an ill-requited passion, which distance from the object of his attachment could not remove.

"He was greatly superior to the style of his age."—HORACE WALPOLE.

After perusing our author's poems, Addison remarked that

"The beauties in our ancient English poets are too slightly passed over by modern writers, who, out of a peculiar singularity, had rather take pains to find fault than endeavour to excel."

Among his other works are four tragedies in alternate rhyme, denominated Monarchieke, viz.: Darius, published 1603; Cressus, 1604; The Alexandrian Tragedy, and Julius Cæsar, 1607.

Alfred the Great, 848-901, the youngest child of Ethelwolf and Osburgha, was born in the royal manor of Wantage in Berkshire, where the kings of the West-Saxons had a palace, supposed to have been built on the site of a Roman station. History has preserved several anecdotes of the childhood and youth of this great prince. He was distinguished above all his brothers by his beauty, graceful manners, and early display of talent, and was on that account the favourite of his parents. Alfred's efforts for the restoration of literature in England were great, and to a certain degree successful. The following works were either written by him or have been attributed to him:

1. In order to make his subjects more generally acquainted with ancient history, Alfred translated into English the historical work of Orosius. A manuscript of this translation is in the Cottonian Library, Tiberius, B. 1, from which it was printed by Daines Barrington. Another copy is now, with the other manuscripts belonging to the Lauderdale Library, in the possession of Lady Dysart.

2. The Anglo-Saxon version of Bede's History of the Anglo-Saxon Church has also been generally attributed to Alfred. Manuscripts of this work are in the Public Library of the University of Cambridge, and in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, No. 41, the latter of which belonged to Leofric, Bishop of Exeter. The other manuscript (MS. Cotton. Otho, B. xi.) was destroyed by the fire in the Cottonian Library. This book also has been printed.

3. Alfred translated for the more especial use of his clergy the Pastoral of Pope Gregory, and is said to have sent a copy of it to each of his bishops, whose names were severally inserted in the translator's preface. Three of the original copies thus sent are still preserved, addressed to Wulfseig, Bishop of Sherborne, (in the Public Library, Cambridge,) to Wærferth, Bishop of Worcester, (in the Bodleian Library, MS. Hatton, No. 88,) and to Plegmund of Canterbury, (MS. Cotton. Tiberius, B. xi.) The latter is very much injured by the fire. The Cambridge MS., which had been preserved in the cathedral of Wells, and was sent by Bishop Jewel to Archbishop Parker, is as clean and fresh in appearance as when it came from the hands of Alfred's scribe, and is a noble specimen of Anglo-Saxon writing. The Cottonian MS. Otho, B. ii., now destroyed by the fire, contained a copy from the one sent by the king to Hehstan, Bishop of London, apparently of the 10th or beginning of the 11th century. There is also a somewhat later transcript of Wulfseig's copy of the Pastoral in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, and another manuscript of the book in the library of Corpus Christi College, No. 12. This work has not been printed. The Dialogues of Pope Gregory were translated by Wærferth, Bishop of Worcester, under Alfred's direction.

4. Another work of the king's, which is still preserved, is a select translation of the Soliloquies of St. Augustine. A copy of it is in MS. Cotton. Vitellius, A. xv., but it has not been printed.

5. One of the most interesting of Alfred's translations is that of the treatise of Boethius De Consolatione Philosophiæ, a work exceedingly popular during the Middle Ages. It is more freely translated than his other books, and exhibits, more than any of them, the philosophical turn of Alfred's mind. The original is said to have been glossed for the king by Asser, to render it more easily intelligible. A manuscript of this work, written in the common hand of the 10th century, Otho, A. vi., has been so much injured by fire that it consists only of a few ragged leaves. A transcript of it is preserved among the manuscripts of Junius in the Bodleian Library. Another, written towards the beginning of the 12th century, is in the Bodleian Library. It has been twice printed.

6. Alfred's Manual, or Hand-book, (as he called it,) existed in the time of William of Malmesbury. Asser says that it was about the size of a Psalter, and that Alfred entered in it prayers and psalms, and his daily observations, and that he always carried it about with him. It appears, from William of Malmesbury, that it also contained historical anecdotes and miscellaneous entries.

7. William of Malmesbury informs us that the king, at the time of his death, had commenced an Anglo-Saxon version of the Psalms, which he left unfinished; some have pretended that Alfred translated other parts of the Bible.

8. Most writers who have given lists of Alfred's works include among them what they call Alfred's Proverbs. This work, which has been recently printed, is preserved in two manuscripts, in MS. Trin. Coll., Cambridge, B. xiv.

xxxix., and in MS. Col. Jes., Oxford, i. xxix.; a third, MS. Cotton. Galba, A. xix., perished in the fire. They are of the beginning of the 13th century. It is a collection of moral instructions in verse, conveyed in popular proverbs, supposed to be addressed by him to his people and to his son, but it has no claim to be ranked among his works. This tract must have been in existence early in the 12th century, for it is mentioned by Ailred of Rievaulx.

9. The translation of Esop's Fables attributed to King Alfred was probably not more genuine. Our knowledge of this book is derived from the Epilogue to the fables of the Anglo-Norman poetess Marie, who says that she translated them from Alfred's English version:

"Esop apelum cest livre,
Qu'il translata e fist escrire;
De Griu en Latin le turna.
Li reis Alvres, que mort l'ama,
Le translata puis en Engleis;
Et jeo l'al rimée on Franceis, etc."

MS. Harl., No. 978, fol. 87, vo.

Some of the manuscripts of these fables give a different reading of the name, but that of Alfred is the best supported. His name long continued to be popular, and was probably affixed in different ways to many such works as the two last mentioned. The introduction to a Latin version of Esop, preserved in a manuscript in the British Museum, also mentions Alfred's English translation, in a manner which can leave little doubt of the existence of such a book bearing that monarch's name.

The old bibliographers, such as Bale and Leland, enumerate other works under the name of Alfred, for which there is no authority. We think also that it is not necessary to place among the king's literary productions his enactments, which are printed in all the editions of the Anglo-Saxon laws.

His translations are executed with much spirit. As he tells us himself, he "sometimes interprets word for word, and sometimes meaning for meaning;" and he not unfrequently inserted passages of his own. The most interesting of his works in respect to this latter point are, his version of Boethius, containing several very remarkable additions, and his Orosius, in the geographical part of which he has given the valuable narratives of two northern navigators, Ohtere and Wulfstan, whom he had personally examined. In point of style, Alfred's translations may be considered as the purest specimens we possess of Anglo-Saxon prose.

Former biographers have been induced to give him the fame of being a poet as well as a prose writer; this is owing to Asser's account of the love which the king showed always to his native poetry, and of the metrical version of the Metres of Boethius, attributed to him. We have already stated it as our opinion that these metres were not the work of Alfred; they were probably composed by some obscure writer of the 10th century, who imagined that Alfred's version of Boethius was imperfect so long as the metres were only given in prose. If Alfred had written verse, it would certainly have possessed some of the higher characteristics which distinguish that class of compositions in the Anglo-Saxon language; and we cannot believe that he would have submitted to the puerile occupation of arranging his own words in alliterative couplets.

He died on the 28th of October, 901. His children, and even his grand-children, inherited from him the same greatness of mind, and love of science and literature, which were so conspicuous in his own character. His name continued to be cherished among his countrymen till the extinction of Anglo-Saxon independence, and it was without doubt the subject of numerous traditionary stories and anecdotes. Even in the 12th and 13th centuries his memory was kept alive as the burden of popular songs, and by productions similar to the fables and proverbs already mentioned.

EDITIONS OF KING ALFRED'S WORKS.—The preface to the Pastoral was printed with Asser's Life, by Matthew Parker, fol., Lond., 1574; it was reprinted at Leyden, in 1697, par Bon. Vulcanium Brugensem, in a scarce, anonymous work, entitled De Literis et Lingua Oetarum, sive Gothorum: it was again printed by Camden, in his Anglica Normannica, &c. Scripta, fol. Francof., 1603; and afterwards by Wise, in his edition of Asser, 8vo, Oxon., 1722.

Alfred of Beverly, born about 1100, derives his chief importance from the dispute which has arisen whether he preceded or came after Geoffrey of Monmouth. Historians and bibliographers have all fixed at too early a date the period when Alfred of Beverly compiled his history. All that we know of his life is derived from his own writings. While occupied with his historical researches, it appears that the history of Geoffrey of Monmouth was published, and began to create a great sensation. Alfred hearing people talk of British kings of whom he was entirely ignorant, and ashamed to be obliged continually to confess that he knew nothing about them, became anxious to obtain a sight of the new history, and with much difficulty succeeded. He perused it with avidity, and, charmed with the novelty of its contents, he would have made a transcript of it for himself if he had been allowed sufficient time, and had possessed money enough to buy the materials at once; but this not being the case, he determined to make an abridgment of it. Alfred informs us that, having abridged the history of the Britons, he determined to abridge other historians, so as to continue his book through the Saxon and Norman times. We trace, as having gone through this process, among others, Bede, Florence of Worcester, and the Northern writer Simeon of Durham, which historian appears to have been the last he used, for Alfred's history closes in the same year with that of Simeon, A.D. 1129, the 29th year of Henry I. His historical notices are extremely brief, and his style is that of the ordinary writers of his age. Bale has increased the number of works attributed to Alfred of Beverly, by making three different titles out of his one known historical epitome. He is said to have written a life of John of Beverly; but we know with more certainty that he was the author of a work on the rights and privileges of his church, which he is said in the title to have translated from English into Latin, and which was preserved in the Cottonian Library, but the volume containing it unfortunately perished in the fire. Edition, Aluredi Beverlacensis Annales, sive Historia de Gestis Regum Britannie, Libris ix., e codice pervetusto. . . Descriptis edititque Tho. Hearnus, Oxon., 1716, 8vo.—Abbrev. from Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Alfred, (flourished 1170,) who by some writers is named the Philosopher, is enumerated by Roger Bacon among those who had translated the Arabian books of science into Latin. Pits, partly on the authority of Boston of Bury, tells us that he wandered in search of learning through France and Italy, and that at Rome he was received into the family of Cardinal Ottobini, who made him his chaplain, and brought him to England, when he was sent as legate by Pope Urban IV. to make peace between Henry III. and his barons. This however cannot be correct, for one of Alfred's principal works, the translation (from the Arabic) of Aristotle's treatise, De Vegetabilibus et Plantis, is dedicated to Roger of Hereford, whose contemporary he must have been. In the manuscripts of this book, preserved in the Bibliothèque Royale at Paris, the author is sometimes named simply Magister Alfredus, and at others Alfredus de Sarchel. M. Jourdain states reasons for believing that this work was translated in Spain. Pits mentions the titles of several other books attributed to him, most of which are still extant: they are, 1. De Musica, of which he gives as the first words, Licet mihi inter meditantum. 2. In Boethium de Consolatione Philosophiæ, in five books, not now known to exist. 3. In Meteora Aristotelis. This is preserved in a manuscript in the Royal Library at Paris, where the author's name is corruptly spelt Alphiolus. 4. De Rerum Natura. M. Jourdain believes this to be the treatise De Causis Elementorum, which is found in most of the manuscripts joined to the translation of Aristotle De Vegetabilibus, and clearly resembles it in style. 5. De Motu Cordis. M. Jourdain thinks this may be the same as a short treatise, evidently translated from the Arabic, which is found under the same title in a MS. in the Royal Library at Paris, MS. Lat. No. 6443.

6. Leland mentions a treatise by this writer, (or some person of the same name,) De Educatione Accipitrum. Perhaps the Aluredus Anglicus, mentioned by Boston of Bury as Cardinal Ottonboni's chaplain, and as the author of the treatise on music, and the Commentary on Boethius, was a different person from the philosopher.—Abbreviated from Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Alfric, or Alfred of Malmesbury, flourished in 990. William of Malmesbury tells us that he was a learned man. The old bibliographers attribute to this writer a scientific treatise De Naturis Rerum, and a history of his abbey, De Rebus sui Conobii. No such works, however, are now known to exist. William of Malmesbury has wrongly attributed to this Alfric the writings of Alfric of Canterbury.—Abbreviated from Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Alfric of Canterbury, died 1006. No Anglo-Saxon writer has excited so much interest in modern times by his works as Alfric the Grammarian, as he has been generally named, from his grammar; and yet there are few whose personal history is involved in so much confusion and uncertainty. This arises, in part, from the name having been extremely common among the Anglo-Saxons, and from the difficulty of identifying the author of the different books which bear this name by internal evidence. Leland separated one Alfric into three, and Bale gave each of these three a distinct chapter. On the other hand, Usher joined three into one, confounding Alfric of Canterbury with Alfric of York and Alfric of Malmesbury. The historians of the 12th and 13th centuries, such as William of Malmesbury, and Matthew Paris, do not seem to have escaped from the same confusion.

Alfric is said to have been descended from a noble family, his father being Ealdorman or Earl of Kent. When young, his education was intrusted to one of the secular priests, who, as he says, could with difficulty understand Latin, and from whose misconduct he seems to have derived a contempt for the whole class of secular clergy. We think it probable that Alfric remained at Winchester, until A.D. 988 or 989, when he was sent by Alpheg, then Bishop of Winchester, to regulate or govern the newly-established Abbey of Cerne, in Dorsetshire, at the request of the founder, Ealdorman Ethelmer. The next event in the life of Alfric is his promotion to the Bishopric of Wilton. We are justified in believing that he filled this bishopric during a very brief period previous to the death of Sigieric of Canterbury, in 995. In 995, Alfric succeeded Sigieric as Archbishop of Canterbury; and it is remarkable that in the instrument of his election he is called simply a monk of Abingdon. All we know of the remainder of his life is, that he ruled his diocese with vigour and piety during a period of continual sufferings from the inroads of the Danes. Bridferth, who dedicated to him his life of Dunstan, speaks of the wonderful extent of his learning. Alfric died on the 16th of November, 1006.

It is probable that the greater part of Alfric's numerous writings are still extant. They consist chiefly of translations, and may be conveniently divided into three classes: those intended for the instruction of youth, theological works written after his mission to the Abbey of Cerne, and those which he composed after his elevation to the Bishopric of Wilton. 1. The Latin Grammar, which is a translation from the old grammars of Donatus and Priscian, and from which Alfric has derived his title of Grammaticus. Several manuscripts of his grammar are preserved, and it was printed by Somner in the 17th century. The second, or Anglo-Saxon, preface alludes to his homilies, and therefore must have been written after he left Winchester. 2. The Glossary of Latin words most commonly used in conversation, (for which purpose it was intended,) which is generally found in the same manuscripts with the Grammar, was also published by Somner. 3. The Colloquium, or conversation in Latin, with an interlinear Saxon gloss, intended to further the same object as the Glossary, and forming a second book to it. 4. We ought probably to attribute to Alfric the Anglo-Saxon Manual of Astronomy, which occurs so frequently in early manuscripts. It is found in a large manuscript of Alfric's works in the Public Library of the University of Cambridge, and contains many of the characteristics of Alfric's writings, particularly his expressions of contempt for the "unlearned priests;" recently printed. 5. A collection of homilies, (the greatest of all Alfric's works,) amounting in number to eighty, and written, as he acknowledges, at the suggestion of Ethelmer and Ethelward. 6. After this collection was completed, Alfric, at the request of Ethelward, compiled from the Latin another set of homilies, commemorative of the different saints revered by the Anglo-Saxon church, divided, like the former, into two books. A copy of this work will be found in MS. Cotton. Julius. E. vii. 7. One of the next works of Alfric, or at least one of those completed before he was raised to a bishopric, was the translation of the Heptateuch. 8. A treatise on the Old and New Testament, addressed to Sigward set East-Heolon, which was printed with a translation by Lisle. 9. A treatise on the Trinity, addressed to Wulfgeat set Ylmandune, preserved in manuscript in the Bodleian Library. 10. The abridgment of Ethelwold's Constitutions, for the monks of Eynsham, preserved in manuscript at Cambridge, MS. Coop. Chr. Coll., No. 265. 11. Perhaps Alfric was the author of the translation of the life of Guthlac, by Felix of Croyland, preserved in MS. Cotton. Vespas. D. xxi. 12. An Epistle to Sigferth, on the marriage of the clergy. While Bishop of Wilton he probably wrote, 13. The Sermo Alfrici episcopi ad clericos, and 14. The Sermo ad Sacerdotes, both preserved in MS. Coop. Chr. Coll., Camb., No. 265, and in other manuscripts. The latter found also in MS. Cotton. Tiber. A. iii., is addressed to Bishop Wulfine, and is also known as Alfric's Canons. It has been printed. These are in Latin and in Anglo-Saxon.—Abbreviated from Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Alfric Bata, d. 1051. He informs us that he was the disciple of the elder Alfric (not of Ethelwold) at Winchester. He is known principally as having republished and enlarged some of the books of scholastic instruction compiled by his master, more particularly the Colloquium, printed by Mr. Thorpe. It is probable that he also republished Alfric's Grammar and Glossary, for they are joined with the Colloquium in the manuscript of the latter preserved at Oxford; and in the copy of the grammar printed by Somner there is a short epistle connecting Alfric's name with that of King Canute, which cannot refer to Alfric of Canterbury. He is supposed to be the author of the Life of Ethelwold; also of one of the homilies (entitled in some manuscripts In Natale Unius Confessoris) a marginal note to which, in one of the manuscripts, states that it was composed at the desire of the younger Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, who is said to have succeeded Cynewulf in 1008.—*Abbreviated from Wright's Biog. Alison, Archibald, 1757-1839, son of Andrew Alison, of Edinburgh, was matriculated at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1775. He was senior minister of the Episcopal Chapel, Cowgate, Edinburgh. In 1790 he published Essays on the Nature and Principles of Taste, which work has attained a wide celebrity. He gave to the world a number of sermons, 1809-15, also a Memoir of the Life and Writings of Lord Woodhouselee. Trans. Ed. R. Soc. vii. 515, 1818.

"Mr. Alison maintains that all beauty, or, at least, that all the beauty of material objects, depends upon the associations that may have connected them with the ordinary affections of our nature; and in this, which is the fundamental point of his theory, we conceive him to be no less clearly right, than he is convincing and judicious in the copious illustrations by which he has sought to establish its truth."—Lord Jeffrey.

Dr. Dibdin extols Mr. Alison's style highly:

"The beautiful and refined fancy, and melodious style of this writer, render his works deserving of a conspicuous place in every well-chosen library."

"An excellent and highly-pleasing work on taste."—Lowndes.

Mr. Alison's sermons have been greatly commended:

"These remind us more of the beautiful harangues of Fenelon, or of the celebrated Oraisons Funèbres of Bossuet, than of any British growth and manufacture. The beauty of the style and imagery is almost sure to attract the attention; and the mind must be dull and sullen indeed that offers a long resistance to the stronger charms which form the grand characteristics of these eloquent discourses. . . . We can hardly help envying the talent by which Mr. Alison has clothed so much wisdom in so much beauty, and made us find in the same work the highest gratifications of taste, and the noblest lessons of virtue."—Edinburgh Review.

Alison, Sir Archibald, Bart., D.C.L., eldest son of the preceding, was b. at Kenley, Shropshire, Dec. 29, 1792, at which place his father was then vicar. He was educated in Edinburgh, where his father was then settled. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1814, and that and the following year he travelled on the Continent, and pub. his Travels in France; 2d ed., 1816, 8vo. He was made Sheriff of Lanarkshire in 1828; Rector of Glasgow Univ., 1851; created a baronet, 1852. He established a high reputation by his Principles of the Criminal Law, Edin., 1832, and The Practice of the Criminal Law, which have become standard authorities with the Scottish bar. His History of Europe from the Commencement of the French Revolution to the Restoration of the Bourbons, pub. in 10 vols. 8vo, 1839-42, established his reputation in Europe and America. The 8th Edinburgh ed.—New Library Edition—was pub. 1849-51, 14 vols. 8vo, £10 10s.; in r. 8vo, £21. 9th ed.,—People's Edition,—1853-55, 12 vols. p. 8vo, and Index vol., £2 11s. It has been reprinted in Paris, Brussels, America, &c., and trans. into French, German, Hindostanee, and Arabic.

Mr. Alison is a high Tory in politics, evidences of which fact will be found in his Essays, Political, Historical, &c., (originally pub. in Blackwood's Mag.,) 1850, 3 vols. 8vo. In 1840 he pub. Principles of Population, 2 vols. 8vo, in which he combats the theory of Malthus.

"Mr. Alison takes a larger—perhaps a loftier—view of the subject of Population than all others. His work possesses a vast fund of matter and personal observation; and those who peruse the volumes will have their minds expanded by various and enlarged speculation and instructed by the new light in which existing information is placed."—Lon. Spectator.

In 1847, he pub. a treatise on Free Trade and Fettered Currency, 8vo; and in the same year, The Life of the Duke of Marlborough; 2d ed, 1852, 8vo; 3d ed., 1855, 8vo. In 1852-57 he pub. vols. i.-vi. of the History of Europe from 1815-52. Of Sir Archibald's first historical work (1789-1815) we have many criticisms before us, but can afford room for brief extracts from two or three only.

"It is, upon the whole, a valuable addition to European literature, evidently compiled with the utmost care: its narration, so far as we can judge, is not perverted by the slightest partiality. Its defects, or what we deem such, are matters partly of taste and partly of political opinion. Its merits are minuteness and honesty,—qualities which may well excuse a faulty style, gross political prejudices, and a fondness for exaggerated and frothy declamation. . . . Whenever we have been led to compare the conflicting accounts of any important event in Mr. Alison's history, we have almost invariably found that his narrative steers judiciously between them and combines the most probable and consistent particulars contained in each. Mr. Alison's general style is not attractive. It is not, however, at least in the narrative part of it, either feeble or displeasing. Its principal defect is the cumbersome and unwieldy construction of its sentences, which frequently causes them to appear slowly and obscure, and sometimes renders their precise meaning doubtful."—Edin. Rev., lxxvi. 1.

"No work could have made such progress in national opinion without substantial qualities. Its vigour of research and its manliness of principle, its accurate knowledge and its animation of style, have been the grounds of its remarkable public favour, as they are the guarantees for its permanent popularity."—Blackw. Mag.

"An accomplished civilian of our own has lately closed with an account of this final struggle (battle of Waterloo) a voluminous history, which has, we know, enjoyed in its progress a very high share of popularity. Agreeing as we do with many of Mr. Alison's political opinions, and approving the spirit of his moral reflections, we have no disposition to question the general merits of a work, &c. We may be pardoned for remarking, in general, that a writer of Mr. Alison's particular qualifications would have acted wisely in compressing the military narratives and disquisitions which abound in his volumes, and in abstaining from certain conclusions which, coming from him, possess, indeed, no other authority than that which his mere powers of language can invest them, but may be quoted by interested persons for their own purposes,—persons who would otherwise pay little attention to Mr. Alison or his work."—Lon. Quar. Rev., lxx. 467.

"The History of Europe during the French Revolution is by far the most remarkable historical work of the century."—For. Quar. Rev.

Sir Archibald Alison's Life of John, Duke of Marlborough, with some Account of his Contemporaries and of the War of the Succession, must be read as a preface to his histories. Of the 2d ed. the author remarks,

"In this edition, which will be considerably more than double the size of the first, the author has endeavoured to convert the military sketch which alone was attempted in the first edition into a more complete history, on the same plan in respect to detail and reference to authority as his History of Europe. No pains have been spared in consulting the best authorities on the subject, both in Great Britain and on the Continent."

Allison, William Pakeney, M.D., political economist, physician, and Professor of the Practice of Medicine in the University of Edinburgh, is a younger brother of the historian, and, like him, highly conservative in his politics, but very popular with the opposite party, on account of the interest he has bestowed on the poor and suffering classes. In connexion with this subject he has been led to the consideration of certain great national questions, and, together with his brother, he has always opposed the existing system of Poor Laws.

"Every individual who cannot afford time to wade through the monstrous volumes of evidence which have been so digested, (by Dr. Allison,) and who feels interested in the subject, must acknowledge himself deeply indebted to the performer of this disinterested act of labour."—Scotsman.

In a work published at Edinburgh in 1850, entitled A Dissertation on the Reclamation of Waste Lands, he fully examines the subject, and recommends the colonization of waste lands by paupers and criminals.—Men of the Time.

Allam, Andrew, 1655-1685, born near Oxford, (at Garsington,) was a pupil of William Wildgoose, a teacher well known at that time. He took holy orders in 1680. He had a predilection for antiquarian pursuits; and besides assisting Anthony Wood in his Athenæ Oxon., he made additions to Notitia, (1684,) and to Holorius's Historical and Chronological Theatre, (pub. 1687.) He also wrote the Epistle prefixed to Dr. Cosin's Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Politeia, &c., containing an account of the doctor's life; a translation of the Life of Iphicrates, Oxf., 1684. He projected a Notitia Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, or History of Cathedrals, but was prevented by death from completing his design.—Biog. Brit.

Allein, Thomas. See ALLAN.

Alleine, or Allein, Joseph, 1633-1688, an eminent Nonconformist minister, was b. at Devizes, Wiltshire, and entered Lincoln College, Oxford, in 1649. He was admitted scholar of Corpus Christi in 1651, and two years afterwards was elected to the chaplainship. So diligent was he in his studies, that he allowed himself but three hours' sleep, and often gave away his "commons" to save more time for his books. He accepted the post of assistant minister to Mr. Newton at Taunton, in 1655. He suffered greatly from imprisonment, and other annoyances, in consequence of his conscientious refusal to accept the act of uniformity of 1662. He was "abundant in labours," holy in his "walk and conversation," and exemplary in all the relations of life. He published a number of religious works, 1658-1674, the best known of which is An Alarm to Unconverted Sinners, 1672, of which 20,000 copies were sold. It appeared three years afterwards, under the title of A Sure Guide to Heaven, when 50,000 copies were disposed of. Since then it has run through many editions, and been the means, through the Divine blessing, of turning "many to righteousness."

"A very awakening and judicious work."—BRICKS&STRETT.

Alleine or Allein, Richard, 1611-1681, a Nonconformist minister, was of St. Alban's-hall, Oxford, and became Rector of Bateau, Somersetshire. Like his namesake, the subject of the preceding article, he was noted for zeal in labours and piety in deportment. He published a number of religious works, of which the Vindicia Pietatis, or Vindication of Godliness from the imputations of Folly and Fancy, Lon., 1663, is still in considerable estimation.

Allen, Ethan, 1742-1789, a brigadier-general in the war of the American Revolution, b. in Roxbury, Conn. He pub. a number of controversial pamphlets, a narrative of his observations during his captivity, and Allen's Theology, or The Oracle of Reason, 1786.

"This last work was intended to ridicule the doctrine of Moses and the prophets. It would be unjust to bring against it the charge of having effected great mischief in the world; for few have had the patience to read it."—Allen's Amer. Biog. Dict.

As might be expected of one silly enough to espouse the absurdities of infidelity, Mr. Allen held some very foolish opinions: viz. that man after death would transmigrate into beasts, birds, fishes, reptiles, &c.; and that he himself should live again in the form of a large white horse.

Allen, Paul, 1775-1826, was born at Providence, R. I. He graduated at Brown University in 1796. He was a contributor to the Phila. Port Folio, the United States Gazette, and the Portico, (associated with Pierpont and Neal.) He was also an editor of the Federal Republican at Baltimore, of the Journal of the Times, and of the Morning Chronicle. He was employed to prepare for the press the travels of Lewis and Clarke. He had long promised a History of the American Revolution, and a large subscription had been secured. It at last appeared in his name, but was written by John Neal and Mr. Watkins. His principal poem has been commended as possessing "simplicity and feeling." He published Original Poems, Serious and Entertaining, 1801.—Allen's Amer. Biog. Dict.

His poem of Noah was pub. 1821, in 5 cantos: it originally consisted of 25; but, having been placed in the hands of Mr. Neal for revision, he judiciously reduced it to its present dimensions.

Allen, Wm. Under this name was published in 1659, the celebrated tract entitled, Killing no Murder, with some additions fit for Public View, to deter and prevent Single Persons and Councils from Usurping Supreme Power. This tract has been attributed both to Colonel Silas Tims and to Colonel Serby. It invited all patriots to assassination, proclaiming that the greatest benefit any Englishman could render his country would be to murder Cromwell. A copy was thrown into the Protector's coach, and it is said that he afterwards always carried loaded pistols, and never knew another moment's peace.

Allen, William, D.D., b. Jan. 2, 1784, at Pittsfield, Mass., son of Rev. Thos. Allen, first minister of Pittsfield, (q. v.); grad. at Harvard Coll., 1802; was Pres. of Bowdoin Coll., 1820-39, at which time he resigned. He was successor of Dr. Channing as a Regent in Harvard Coll. While in that office he prepared the first edition of his American Biographical and Historical Dictionary, pub. 1809, containing notices of about 700 Americans. This was the first book of general biography issued in the U.S.; 2d ed., 1832, contained more than 1800 names; 3d ed., Bost., 1837, r. 8vo, contains the names of 7000 Americans more or less distinguished. In 1807 he prepared the lives of American ministers for the Rev. David Bogue's History of Dissenters, Lon., 1809, 2 vols. 8vo; 1812, 4 vols. 8vo. He made a collection of more than 10,000 words not found in the dictionaries of the English language, 1500 being contributed to Worcester's Dictionary in 1846, 4000 to Webster's in 1854, and 6000 for the projected new ed. of Webster. Baccalaureate Addresses, 1823-29. Junius Unmasked, to prove that Lord Sackville was the real Junius, Bost., 1828, 12mo: see JUNIUS. Accounts of Shipwrecks; Psalms and Hymns, with many Original Hymns, 1835. Allibond, John, D.D., died 1658, son of Rev. Peter Allibond, was of Magd. Coll., Oxford, where his father had preceded him. Anthony Wood gives him a high character as a scholar and a divine:

"This worthy Doctor, who was a Buckinghamshire Man born, and lately the chief master of the Free School joining to Magd. Coll., was a most excellent Latin poet and philologist, and hath published Rustica Academicæ Oxoniensis nuper Reformatæ descriptio: una cum comitis ibidem 1648 habitis. 'Tis a Latin poem, and was twice printed in 1648. He died at Bradwell in Gloucestershire, (of which place he was rector), an. 1658."

Of the above satire—now very rare—on the Parliamentary Visitors, a MS. Key is referred to in Wood's Fasti, by Bliss, ii., 69.

"A Latin poem of exquisite humour, twice printed in 1648; reprinted in 1705, fol.; and again with an Hudibrastic translation by Edward Ward, in the fifth volume of Somers's Collection of Tracts. A very curious copy, with a complete Key in MS., is to be found in Wood's study, No. 423."—LOWNDZ.

Allibond, Peter, 1560–1629, father of the preceding.

"An ingenious man in the opinion of all who knew him, was born at Wardenten, near to Banbury in Oxfordshire, where his name and family had for some generations lived, became a student of Magd. Hall in the beginning of 1578, aged 18 years or thereabouts, took the degree in Arts, travelled for some time beyond the seas, and, on his return, became Rector of Cheyneys in Bucks, where, continuing many years, did much improve the ignorant with his sound doctrine. What he hath written I know not, nor translations which he hath made, only these two from French into English: 1. Comfort for an Afflicted Conscience, wherein is contained both consolation and instruction for the sick, &c., Lon., 1591, Oct., written by John de L'Espine. 2. Confutation of the Popish Transubstantiation, together with a Narration how that the Mass was at sundry times patched and pieced by sundry Popes, &c., Lon., 1592. Allix, Peter, 1641–1717. This eminent divine and profound scholar became so completely Anglicised, and reflected so much credit upon the land of his adoption, that we are willing to make an exception in his case, as we have done in some few others, and give him a place in our register. He was born at Alençon in France, and stationed in the principal church of the Reformed at Charenton near Paris. The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, in 1685, drove him to England, where he became the pastor of a French congregation in conformity with the Established Church. He was profoundly versed in Hebrew and classical literature. His works are very numerous. Reflections on the Books of the Holy Scripture, &c., Lon., 1688.

"These Reflections are not in the form of a continued commentary on the Bible; but take up what may be called the spirit of it, under distinct heads, chiefly with a view, as the title expresses it, to establish the divine origin of Christianity. They were published in French about the same time [1687] that they appeared in English. They were also translated into German, and published at Nuremberg in 1702."—ORMS: Bibl. Bib.

Allot, Robert, is believed to have been the compiler of a very curious and valuable volume of early poetry, which had a large share in the remarkable development of BIBLIOMANIA which characterized the first quarter of the present century. England's Parnassus; or the choicest Flowers of our Modern Poets, with their Poetical comparisons. Descriptions of Bewties, Personages, Castles, Palaces, Mountaines, Groues, Seas, Springs, Rivers, &c. Whereunto are annexed other various discourses, both pleasant and profitable. Imprinted at London, for N. L., C. B., and T. H., 1600.

Of Allot's history nothing is now known. We find a surmise in Brydges' Restituta, (vol. iii, 234,) that he was the Robert Allot who was Fellow of St. John's College in 1599. With regard to the Parnassus, as it "has preserved portions of many scarce poets, whose very names, without such care, might have probably sunk into oblivion, it must ever rank as a book both valuable and curious." Wood seems to have attributed this collection to Charles Fitz-Geffrey:

"He hath also made, as 'tis said, A Collection of choice Flowers and Descriptions, as well out of his, as the works of several others, the most renowned Poets of our Nation: collected about the begunning of the reign of K. James I; but this, tho' I have been many years seeking after, yet I cannot get a sight of it."—Athen. Ozon.

 "It is valuable not only on account of its variety, but also on account of its intrinsic worth as a Compilation pretty ingeniously executed."—Walt's Bib. Brit.

A copy is priced in the Bib. Anglo-Poetica £20, and one was sold in the Roxburghe sale, (3171.), for £21. Having been reprinted by Mr. Park in the Heliconia, "the reprints have pulled down the prices more than one peg."—Dibdin.

"Had the editor of this curious volume, besides citing the names of his authors, added the titles of the works from which he culled his specimens, an infinity of trouble would have been saved to subsequent research; yet the deficiency has served, in a peculiar manner, to mark the successful progress of modern bibliography. When Oldys wrote his preface to Hayward's British Muse, which was first published in 1738, he complains grievously of this omission, observing that most of Allot's poets 'were now so obsolete that not knowing what they wrote, we can have no recourse to their works, if still extant.' Since this sentence was written, such has been the industry of our literary antiquaries, that almost every poem which Allot laid under contribution in forming his volume, has been ascertained, and rendered accessible to the curious inquirer; and so far from the writers being obsolete, after nearly eighty years have been added to their antiquity, we may venture to affirm that, excepting about half a dozen, they are as familiar to us as the poets of the present reign."—Drake's Shakespeare and His Times.

"Robert Allot is a joint sonneteer with E. Gilpin before Markham's 'Devereux,' 1597. They were probably friends, and though Gilpin's name occurs in no other book, he is not unfrequently quoted in England's Parnassus. This affords some slight confirmation that Allot was the compiler of it."—Cottier's Poet. Decameron.

Allston, Washington, 1779-1843. This distinguished artist was the author of a number of poetical and prose compositions. He was born in Georgetown, South Carolina, and entered Harvard College in 1796. In 1813 he published in London, a volume entitled, The Sylphs of the Seasons and other Poems, which seems to have passed unnoticed in the multitude of works issuing from the London press. The principal portion of the contents of this volume had been perused and much admired in MS. by Mr. Allston's friends in Boston. The volume is made up of quite a number of poems, the largest containing between six and seven hundred lines.

"Mr. Allston's versification is peculiarly easy, and seems thrown out with as little effort as it is read. With all his ease, however, he is always musical, and we have only to object to a loose line here and there. . . . Our author's language is all good, but is not strictly the poetical language; and we should think that he had not been a wide and constant reader of the old English poets. . . . We would advise our readers to make themselves acquainted with it. They certainly will find it worthy their pride, in the general poverty of literature in our country."—North American Review, vol. v. 366.

The Romance of Monaldi, which had been written twenty years before, and intended as a contribution to Mr. Dana's Idle Man, was published in 1841, anonymously. Monaldi is a graduate of the Othello school, infuriated by jealousy, and determined himself to become a murderer, because he imagines his wife to be unfaithful. The Rev. Dr. Griswold remarks with reference to Mr. Allston's style:

"All the specimens that I have seen of his prose indicate a remarkable command of language, great descriptive powers, and rare philosophical as well as imaginative talent."

The North American Review speaks in high terms of the literary character of Monaldi:

"We have often pored over Allston's pages to admire the grace and delicacy of his English poetical style. This book is equally remarkable for its rich and harmonious prose. The nice selection of epithets, the faultless arrangement of the members of the sentences, and the rhythmical cadence to which thought and expression seem to move united, combine to make it one of the most finished works in American literature."—Vol. liv. 397.

Mr. Allston was distinguished for his conversational powers and amiability of deportment, as well as for artistic genius and literary taste. "His tongue wrought on his associates and acquaintances like an enchanter's spell, preventing their taking any note of time; and the small hours would be close upon them before they had thought of retiring." He was elected President of Harvard College in 1804, but his ill health obliged him to decline the post. His speech in relation to the British Treaty, delivered in 1796, has been much commended. He drew his eloquence from the best source. "I will hazard the assertion," he remarks,

"That no man ever did or ever will become truly eloquent, without being a constant reader of the Bible, and an admirer of the purity and sublimity of its language."

Ames, Joseph, 1689-1759, an ironmonger in London, gained deserved celebrity and commendation by his excellent Typographical Antiquities; being an Historical Account of Printing in England, with some Memoirs of our ancient Printers, and a Register of the Books printed by them from the year 1471 to 1600; with an Appendix concerning Printing in Scotland and Ireland, to the same time, Lon., 1749. The Rev. Mr. Lewis, who had been collecting materials for a History of Printing in England, urged Mr. Ames to undertake the task. The latter was unwilling to accede to this proposition, doubting his competency, and being aware that Mr. Palmer was occupied with the same design. Mr. Palmer's work, The General History of Printing, &c., appeared in 1732, and so much disappointed the expectations of those conversant with the subject, that Mr. Ames determined to take the matter in hand. It should be stated that Mr. Palmer did not live to complete his book. The portion relating to the English printers was written by George Psalmanazar of "Formosa" celebrity: the Scotch and Irish printers were not noticed at all. Mr. Ames had most valuable aid in his undertaking. The good rector of Margate, who had originally urged him to the task, laid his "auld world" collections at his feet. The enthusiastic John Anstis, Garter King-at-arms, that "boast of heraldry," who had devoted his days and nights to poring over the dusty scrolls of antiquity,

"Their ample page,

Rich with the spoils of time, did now unroll!"

to the edification and vast delight of our learned man of iron. That prince of literary baronets, Sir Hans Sloane, permitted him to labour in his library and rest in his garden; where, after dining on 50,000 books and 3500 manuscripts, he could gather his dessert from luscious fruit-trees, weighed down with their golden burden.

Lord Orford's library was at his command, and the erudition of many friends, ready to supply knowledge, to correct error, and to suggest improvement. Mr. Ames himself had been amassing literary treasures for a quarter of a century. We can imagine with what gratification, after the traffic of the day, he closed his doors at twilight's first haze, and left his iron for his books. Surely Dr. Johnson was right when he said that the happiest life in the world is that of a man of business with a taste for literature! Always in his library, he might tire even of his books; but obliged to be much apart, like a true lover, he leaves them with regret, and hastens to them with delight. In 1749 the Magnum Opus made its appearance. For the times, it was a good book; and its reception was truly gratifying to the author. It told pretty much what was then known; but, better still, it set literary miners to work, and by their researches much more was made known.

Ames modestly declares,

"I do also ingeniously confess, that in attempting this History of Printing I have undertaken a task much too great for my abilities, the extent of which I did not so well perceive at first. . . . I have at least cleared away the rubbish, and furnished materials towards a more perfect structure."

Doubtless much of its merit was owing to our friendly Garter, who tells Ames:

"Use no ceremony in commanding any thing in my power, (1787.) . . . You may without any apology command me, for I have thought it my duty to assist, as far as it is in my power, all who oblige the public."—ANSTIS.

Ames would put down his questions on a folio sheet, and Anstis wrote out answers for him.

Mr. William Herbert, another literary man of business, was so fortunate as to obtain from Sir Peter Thompson, Ames's own copy of his work, interleaved with a great number of his MS. additions and notes. Herbert zealously devoted himself to preparing a new edition of the Typographical Antiquities. He published volume 1st in 1785, volume 2d in 1786, and volume 3d and last in 1790. This was a considerable advance upon the original work, but much was yet required to make a complete History of British Typography. The great objections to Herbert's volumes are their dry technicality and catalogue stiffness. His accuracy and laborious perseverance cannot be too much commended; but we want more in a book than precision and faithfulness. We want a volume which can be read—not merely consulted.

Now of all Englishmen who have ever lived, there never was a man better suited to make a dry study attractive, and a learned subject plain, than Dr. Dibdin of Roxburghe memory. This magician could with his pen dress up a begrimed, uncouth-looking volume in more attractive style than could Grolier's binder with his most cunning tools. He could convert "Belindas" and "Almasas" into BIBLIOMANIACS, and make a dry catalogue of old English poetry more attractive than the last novel. It was but necessary for him to apply the epithets "excessively rare," or "exceedingly curious," and the neglected Caxton in your garret would buy you a year's clothing for your household, and the old family Bible would defray your Christmas festivities. We shall have more to say of him in his place. Now, Dr. Dibdin, so exactly fitted to give us a well-digested, accurately arranged, and withal readable and attractive, History of British Typography, undertook the task. Our zealous editor gave no less than £42 for the interleaved Ames we have referred to, and set manfully to work to let the world see what could be done in this department. In 1810 the first volume appeared, supported by a most respectable subscription, headed by Geo. III., the Dukes of York and Kent, and eighteen public libraries. The 2d volume was published in 1812, the 3d in 1816, and the 4th in 1820.

Ames, (Amesius), Wm., 1576-1633, a learned Puritan divine, was educated at Cambridge, under Dr. Perkins. His strictness gave offence to some in authority at his college, and he took the post of chaplain in the English church at the Hague. Afterwards he accepted the divinity chair at Franeker in Friesland, which he filled for twelve years. His works, principally caustical and controversial, attracted great attention. He wrote chiefly in Latin. Explicatio Utriusque Epistolæ St. Petri, Amsterd., 1625, 1635. The same in English, Lon., 1641.

"It is not a critical work, but it gives a very accurate analysis of the two Epistles, and deduces doctrinal observations from them. Stevens, and as making a theological butt of himself, by his Essay on the Prophecies of Daniel, had charge of a congregation at Cosely, in Staffordshire. Whilst stationed at Hempstead, Stevens wrote some immoral notes on Shakspeare, and subscribed them with Amner's name: this was a trick exactly suited to George's spirit of malignant fun. But as Amner survived this unkind attack, in an unhappy moment he committed suicide by publishing some theological crudities which have perhaps received more notice than they deserve. T. H. Horne thus belabours poor Amner: An Essay towards the Interpretation of the Prophecies of Daniel, &c., Lon., 1776:

"The author adopts the exploded and untenable hypothesis of Grotius, (who has been followed by Le Clerc and others,) that all the prophecies of Daniel terminated in the persecution of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes. This work (which is noticed only to put the unwary reader on his guard against it) was reprinted in 1798, with some other tracts, tending to show that certain passages of Scripture, which clearly announce a future resurrection, relate to nothing more than a mere temporal deliverance. An exposure of some of this author's erroneous notions may be seen in the British Critic, O. S., vol. xiii. p. 290–295."

"John Bunce is the English Rabelais. The soul of Francis Rabelais passed into John Amory, the author of the Life and Adventures of John Bunce. Both were physicians, and enemies of too much gravity. Their great business was to enjoy life. Rabelais indulges his spirit of sensuality in wine, in dried neats' tongues, in Bologna sausages, in Botorgas. John Bunce shows the same symptoms of inordinate satisfaction in bread and butter. - Anderson, Jas., 1662-1728, a distinguished antiquary, gained great credit by his Historical Essay showing that the Crown of Scotland is Imperial and Independent, in answer to Mr. Atwood, Edin., 1705. Atwood's book was burnt by the common hangman, whilst Anderson, surrounded by admiring high dignitaries, received the thanks of the Parliament of Scotland, delivered by the Lord Chancellor. So much for being on the right side! Moreover, Parliament encouraged the rejoicing champion of the "Imperial Crown" to undertake the publication of a collection of the Ancient Charters of Scotland, with fac-similes of the seals of the Scottish Kings. £300, and afterwards £1050, (the latter it is said was never paid,) were voted to him for this purpose. This work, Selectus Diplomatum et Numismatum Scotie Thesaurus, &c., was not published until 1739, eleven years after the author's death. Thomas Carte—the laborious, faithful, ill-used Thomas Carte, whose devotion to his historical labours put even Dr. Manthey to the blush—writes in 1736:

"A person of extensive reading, who, with judicious selection, and good taste, keeps a common-place book, and afterwards communicates the contents to the public, certainly merits the grateful acknowledgments of those who, at so cheap a rate, and in so easy a manner, are furnished with rational entertainment; the fruit of many years' attention, and much labour, on the part of the compiler. . . Mr. Andrews seems in his preface to be apprehensive that his complement might meet with an ungracious reception from the reviewers. Surely his fears were groundless! Those critics, we conceive, must be very ill-natured who could snarl at the well-intended offer of a book, by no means ill-calculated for their entertainment."—Lon. Monthly Review.

We might say much in praise of good compilations of anecdotes and ana, but we shall prefer to quote a higher authority than our own:

"I love anecdotes. I fancy mankind may come, in time, to write all aphoristically, except a narrative; grow weary of preparation, and connection, and illustration, and all those arts by which a big book is made. If a man is to wait till he weaves anecdotes into a system, we may be long in getting them, and get but few, in comparison of what we might get."—DR. JOHNSON.

"In the work before us we have the history of all authors most interesting to a Briton,—that of his own country, treated on a new, and, we think, an excellent plan. . . Mr. Andrews's style is, in general, well adapted to his subject; perspicuous, though concise, and at once elegant and nervous. . . When his plan is completed, he will have supplied a desideratum in English literature, by giving, within a reasonable compass, and connected with the events of neighbouring states, the history of Great Britain, selected with judgment, abridged with accuracy, enriched with erudition, and occasionally embellished with wit."—Lon. Monthly Review.

"The Notes to this valuable historical work contain a great variety of curious and amusing particulars."—Lowndes.

3. A Continuation of Henry's History of Great Britain, Lon., 1796.

The plan of Dr. Henry's History was most admirable, and we are not surprised that Mr. Andrews should have followed so good a model. We shall dwell more at large upon the advantages of this arrangement in the proper place. (See HENRY, ROBT.) Dr. Henry's work concluded with the accession of Henry VIII. Mr. Andrews continued the history to the accession of James I. The hope expressed, by a reviewer of the work, "that the author's health and spirits would enable him to complete the undertaking, and to bring it down to the present time," (1797,) was disappointed. The author "rested from his many useful labours" within six months from the date of the expression of this hope. See Obituary, Gent. Mag., Sept., 1797. Having long ardently desired the appearance of a complete History of England, and the English—of the people as well as their kings—of the customs of the fire-side, as well as the intrigues of the court—we acknowledge with gratitude the accomplishment of our wish in the Pictorial History of England pub. by Charles Knight, one of the first literary benefactors of the age. This excellent work is arranged upon Henry's plan, with advantages which neither Henry nor any one man could have secured. We entirely concur with the intelligent eulogium of the Edinburgh Review, that it is the "Very thing required by the popular taste of the present day, [by the erudite judgment as well, we should have added:] adding to the advantage of a clear historical narrative, all the varied illustrations of which the subject is capable."

"A clear and sensible work, containing much valuable information."—LONDON.

Andrews, Lancelot, 1555-1626, successively Bishop of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester, was a native of London. He was educated at Merchant-Tailor's School and Pembroke Hall, Cambridge. The Church of England contains no name more truly venerable than that of this good prelate. For polish and suavity of manners he was excelled by no gentleman of the court; in piety, by no anchorite of better times and purer days. In the discharge of all the duties of religion, he so walked as to be an illustrious exemplar to his flock and to the church of God. James I. had so high an opinion of his abilities, that he employed him to answer Bellarmine's Treatise against his own Defence of the Right of Kings. He was also a favourite with Charles I. Casaubon, Cluverius, Vossius, Grotius, Peter du Moulin, Barclay, and Erpenius were among his correspondents. Lord Clarendon regrets that he was not raised to the primacy on the death of Archbishop Bancroft. Thus respected in life, he was not less honoured at his death, by a Latin elegy from the author of Paradise Lost. He wrote a number of works, pub. 1589-1610, and some others were made public after his decease. His Manual of Devotion in Greek and Latin, was translated by Dean Stanhope, and has been frequently reprinted. He was one of the translators of the authorized version of the Holy Scriptures, for which duty he was well qualified: "a scholar, and a ripe and good one," he had the credit of understanding fifteen languages. We are less surprised at the holy character of this good man, when we are informed that he devoted several hours each day to private prayer. Thus he drew his strength from an unfailling fountain, and his wisdom from the "Father of Lights."

"This is that Andrews, the ointment of whose name is sweeter than spices! This is that celebrated Bishop of Winton, whose learning King James admired above all his chaplains!"—HACKER.

Fuller calls him a "peerless prelate," and tells us in his own style of quiet humour:

"He was an inimitable preacher in his way; and such plagiarists who have stolen his sermons could never steal his preaching, and could make nothing of that whereof he made all things as he desired. Pious and pleasant Bishop Felton (his contemporary and colleague) endeavoured in vain, in his sermons, to assimilate his style; and therefore said merrily of himself, 'I had almost marred my own natural trot, by endeavouring to imitate his artificial snail.'"

"His life was a life of prayer: a great part of five hours every day did he spend in prayer and devotion to God."—BESSON BUCKENBERG: General Sermon on Bp. Andrews.

"He was so skilled in all, that the world wanted learning to know how learned he was."—FULLER.

"Indeed, he was the most apostolical and primitive-like divine, in my opinion, that ever wore a rochet, in his age; of a most venerable gravity, and yet most sweet in all commerce; the most devout that ever I saw when he appeared before God; of such a growth in all kinds of learning, that very able clerks were of low stature to him. . . . In the pulpit, a Homer among preachers."—BR. HACKER: Life of Williams.

Bp. Andrews has the credit, or discredit, as tastes vary, of being the father of the quaint school of composition, of which Donne is one of the most prominent specimens. His Posthumous and Orphan Lectures have been greatly admired.

"A theological student will do well to make himself acquainted with his writings. There is frequently a force and vividness in his language, a picturesqueness in his way of exhibiting the subject, a point in his expressions, and a harmony in his periods, that we shall vainly seek in the more sober and popular divines of the succeeding schools. His sermons contain a rich mine of wisdom and erudition."

This Manual is composed of sentences from the Sacred Scriptures, and extracts from the fathers. It was compiled for his own use, (præces privatae), and was found after his death "worn in pieces by his fingers, and wet with his tears."

"When thou hast bought the book, enter into thy closet and shut the door, pray with Bishop Andrews for one week, and he will be thy companion for the residue of thy years; he will be pleasant in thy life, and in thy death he will not forsake thee."—STANHOPE.

"It is a compact and ably-executed selection; without the constraint of a precise form, it presents a rich collection of materials for prayer; and whether as an enchiridion of devotional aspirations, a guide to self-examination, or an aid to pious reflection, it will be found of great utility."

The good bishop's motto was—

"And who is sufficient for these things?"

Perhaps the title of one will satisfy our readers, and cause them to excuse the rest of the catalogue: The Baron KINKVER-VANKOTSODORSRAKENGOTCHDERN, 1781. After the performance of the Baron, an extensive maxillary dislocation of the members of the dramatic corps need not excite surprise. The Biographia Dramatica gives Mr. Miles this cruel blow—

"This gentleman is . . . a dealer in gunpowder; but his works, in their effect, by no means resemble so active a composition, being utterly deficient in point of force and splendour."

"The law in relation to water-courses is becoming daily of increasing importance, and Mr. Angell, in his work, has commendably discussed the subject. Local legislation has altered, in many of the States, the common law relative to water-courses, but this does not preclude the necessity in many cases of resorting to well-settled principles, in order to expound these legislative acts. No intelligent lawyer can well practise without Mr. Angell's treatise on water-courses."—3 Kent's Com. 463.

Mr. Angell has furnished the profession, in the present publication, with a work that was much needed. He has collected the materials for his book with great industry, from a variety of sources that are not generally accessible, and his work is a valuable contribution to our jurisprudence."—Marvin's Legal Bibliography.

"We have here the last of Mr. Angell's useful labours for the profession of which he was a distinguished ornament. Being left incomplete, it was finished in a very satisfactory manner by Mr. Durfee."

"The work contains a thorough and accurate analysis of all the cases, English and American, upon the important subject on which it treats, and, in addition, a chapter upon canals, railways, ferries, and navigable rivers, which gives much valuable matter in a condensed and perspicuous style. It presents, as is usual in all Mr. Angell's treatises, the very point decided in each case."

Annesley, Arthur, Earl of Anglesey, 1614-1686, was Lord Privy-Seal under Charles II. He became a Fellow-Commoner of Magd. Coll., Oxf., about 1630. At the Restoration he was created Earl of Anglesey. His lordship was the author of a number of political and theological works. Truth Unveiled, with a treatise on Transubstantiation, Lon., 1676. The King's Right of Indulgence in Spiritual Matters, with the equity thereof asserted, 1688. Happy Future State of England, 1688. Memoirs, &c., 1693, etc.

"He was a person very subtil, cunning, and reserved in the managery and transacting his affairs; of more than ordinary parts, and one who had the command of a very smooth, sharp, and keen pen. He was also much conversant in Books, and a great Calvinist, but his known countenance and encouragement given to persons of very different persuasions in matters of religion, hath left it somewhat difficult, at least in some men's judgments, presumptorily to determine among what sort of men, as to point of religion, he himself ought in truth to have been ranked."—Wood's Athen. Oxon.

Bishop Burnet describes him as a tedious and ungraceful orator; a grave, abandoned, corrupt man, whom no party would trust. But on the other hand, see Dr. Campbell's life of his lordship in the Biographia Britannica, who declares that "it is not easy to say any thing worthy of so great a man's character." When Drs. Burnet and Campbell disagree, who shall decide?

"That his Lordship sailed with the times, remains notorious. Those principles must be of an accommodating temper which could suffer the same man to be president of a republican council of state, and recommend him for chancellor to an arbitrary and popish king. Once when the Earl of Essex charged him in the House of Lords with being prayed for by the Papists, Anglesey said, 'He believed it was not so; but if Jews in their synagogues, or Turks in their mosques, would pray for him unasked, he should be glad to be the better for their devotion.'"—Walpole's H. & N. Authors.

"He was capable of great application, and a man of a grave deportment; but stuck at nothing and was ashamed of nothing. . . . He seemed to have no regard to common decencies, but sold every thing that was in his power, and sold himself so often, that at last the price fell so low that he grew useless."—Burnet's History of the Reign of Charles II.

Dr. Kippis, the editor of the Biographia Britannica, was quite indignant at Walpole's styling it (for giving, as he thought, too favourable an opinion of our author) "Vindictio Britannica," or a "Defence of Everybody;" whereupon the editor remarks, in his 2d edition,

"If we have been guilty of an excess of gentleness, we must guard for the future against this amiable error. It will behoove us, for instance, when we come to the Life of Sir Robert Walpole, to take care that we be not too milky."

The lively Horace could have afforded to laugh at this threat; his alphabetical distance from the Doctor's vengeance rendered him very secure. Before the slowly-advancing foe could reach the letter "W," the "Blue" and the "Red Chambers," the "Round Tower," and the "Tribune" of Strawberry Hill, would, in all probability, know no more the collector of trinkets, and the distributor of bons mots. True enough! some eighteen years were required to reach the letter "F," and the "force of" book-making "could no further go." At this rate, would it not require a Methuselah of an editor to punish Walpole, Sir Robert, for the sins of Walpole, Horace? Let not the alphabetical editor threaten in "A" what he intends to do in "W!" "Life is short," and biographies are "long;" which last consideration induces us to resume, that we may speedily cut short, that of Arthur, Earl of Anglesey. We shall gratify Anthony Wood, who seems in this instance quite sanguinary, by permitting him to despatch our "Author Anglesey," as he rather contemptuously designates the earl:

"At length, after our author, Arthur, Earl of Anglesey, had acted the part of a Politician, and ran with the times for more than 45 years, he gave way to fate in his house in Drury Lane, in 1686. He left behind him a choice library of books, which were exposed to sale by way of Auction, in Oct., Nov., &c. following."

The mention of that "Library of books" will touch a chord in the bosom of many a Bibliomaniac; and being slightly of that order ourselves, we shall crave the indulgence of the general reader to linger a moment in this "Library." Dr. Campbell gives the earl no small praise for his book-collecting zeal:

"He was one of the first English Peers who distinguished himself by collecting a fine library, which he performed with great care, as well as at a large expense; and as he was desirous that so valuable a collection might not be quickly dissipated, but remain in his family, he caused it to be disposed in a manner suitable to its worth in a particular department of Anglesey House. But these precautions proved fruitless, as his Lordship's good intentions likewise did; his books, within a few months after his decease, being exposed to public sale by Mr. Millington, a famous auctioneer."

We marvel that Dr. Dibdin omitted to place our Bibliomaniac in his list of "Collectors of Books in Great Britain." See BIBLIOMANIA. Now this auction sale would be memorable were it only for the discovery of the "famous memorandum," made by the earl on the blank leaf of a copy of EIKON BASILIKÉ; but we must not prolong this hydra-headed article by any further dissertations. How this curious memorandum was accidentally discovered, how it was purposely published, how a great controversy thence arose, how sundry controversialists were "set together by the ears," how men, usually amiable enough, in disputing about the EIKON BASILIKÉ presented any thing but the portraiture of unprejudiced judges in the premises—all these matters will be found in the Life of Bp. Gauden, in the present volume. For a detailed account of the whole controversy, the reader is referred to the Biog. Britannica, article Gauden.

Anselm, 1033–1109, like his predecessor Lanfranc, was a native of Italy. He was born at Aosta, in Piedmont, at the foot of the Graian Alps, about the year 1033. In his childhood he had imbibed religious sentiments from the teaching and example of his mother, and exhibited an early taste for learning. His father discouraged the child in his pursuits, and when, at the age of fifteen, Anselm ventured to declare his wish to embrace a monastic life, the anger of the parent was so strongly expressed, that the youth determined to quit his home and country, and throw himself upon the wide world. Of the next three years of Anselm's life, we only know that they were spent, perhaps fruitlessly, partly in Burgundy and partly in France. It does not appear how he was occupied during this period, but in the course of his wanderings he arrived at Avranches, and there he first heard of the fame of his countryman Lanfranc and the school of Bec. The eagerness after learning which had distinguished Anselm in his childhood now returned, and he hastened to Bec to place himself under Lanfranc's tuition. He devoted himself to his studies with wonderful perseverance, scarcely quitting his books by night or by day, and often forgetting his meals. When Lanfranc at length made him a partner in his labours, and intrusted to him the instruction of others, Anselm showed little taste for his occupation; he preferred solitude and meditation to an active life, and after much doubting as to where and how he should take the habit, and after consulting with Lanfranc and with Maurilius, Archbishop of Rouen, he became a monk in the abbey of Bec, in the twenty-seventh year of his age, (A. D. 1060.) Still he was not allowed to remain inactive; for, when Lanfranc was made Abbot of Caen, (not, as commonly supposed, in 1063, but in 1066,) Anselm was chosen to succeed him as Prior of Bec, an office which he held till Abbot Herluin's death in 1078, when he was further raised to be his successor. As monk and prior, he was distinguished so much by his piety and virtues, that his brethren believed him to be possessed of the power of working miracles. The abbey of Bec had possessions in England, and soon after his election Abbot Anselm found it necessary to visit them. This was a favourable opportunity of consulting with his ancient friend Lanfranc, by whom he was received at Canterbury with the greatest marks of distinction and esteem. He spent a short time in the society of the monks of Canterbury, and gave his advice in the question then agitated relating to the sanctity of the Saxon Archbishop Ælfege. In other parts of England, Anselm was received with the same marks of respect as at Canterbury. In 1088, Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, died, and in 1093, Anselm, much against his will, obeyed the commands of William Rufus, by accepting the vacant see. He died of a lingering illness, attended by a distaste for all kinds of nourishment, on the 21st of April, 1109, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, after having held the see of Canterbury sixteen years. He was buried in his cathedral, at the head of his friend and predecessor, Lanfranc.

By his rare genius he did much towards bringing metaphysics into repute. He laid the foundation of a new school of theology, which was free from the servile character of the older writers, who did little more than collect together a heap of authorities on the subjects which they treated. The Monologium and the Proslodium are admirable specimens of abstract reasoning. His reading was extensive, and his style is clear and vigorous. His published writings are, 1. The Monologion, a metaphysical treatise, in which Anselm attempts to establish, by abstract reasoning, the existence of God, his attributes, &c. He submitted this work to the judgment of Lanfranc, before he ventured to publish it. 2. The Proslodium, in which he undertakes to prove the existence of God by one single, continued argument. 3. The answer to Gaunilo, a monk of Marmoutier, who had criticised the Proslodium, and espoused the cause of the incipiens (whom Anselm had introduced as his imaginary opponent) against Anselm's arguments. In this tract he enlarges and explains some of his arguments which had been misunderstood. 4. On the Trinity and the Incarnation, a controversial treatise against the celebrated philosopher Roscelin. 5. On the Procession of the Holy Ghost, another controversial treatise, in which he collected the arguments he had employed in the Council of Bari against the Greeks, who denied that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Son. Anselm is said to have written this book between 1100 and 1103, at the request of Hildebert, Bishop of Mans. 6. Dialogue in twenty-eight chapters, De casu Diaboli, treating chiefly on the subject of the origin of evil. 7. A treatise entitled Cur Deus Homo? in two books, written in the form of a dialogue between the author and Boso, Abbot of Bec, for the purpose of showing the necessity of the Christian scheme of redemption, and proving the resurrection of the body. It was begun in England, and finished in Italy. 8. A treatise in twenty-nine chapters on the Conception of the Virgin, and on Original Sin, composed at Lyons, Anstey, Christopher, 1724-1805, was a son of the Rev. Christopher Anstey, Rector of Brinkeley, in Cambridgeshire. He pub. a number of works, 1766-1804; but his fame rests upon The New Bath Guide, one of the most popular poems of the day, pub. in Lon., 1766. Dodsley gave £200 for the copyright, which Anstey bestowed in aid of the hospital at Bath. The publisher declared that the profits on the sale were greater than he had ever gained in the same period by any other book, and in 1777 he returned it to the author.

"There are a thousand strains of humour in these high wrought Epistles, some of which do not occur to you at the first reading;—at propus, te capiet magis:—the author frequently heightens and enriches his humour by parodies and imitations."—Lon. Monthly Review, 1766.

Smollett has borrowed so largely from Anstey, that Humphrey Clinker may almost be called The New Bath Guide in Prose, so far as characters and situations are concerned.

"But Anstey's diverting satire was but a slight sketch compared to the finished and elaborate manner in which Smollett has, in the first place, identified his characters, and then filled them with language, sentiments, and powers of observation in exact correspondence with their talents, temper, condition, and disposition."—SIR WALTER SCOTT.

Several authors, who shall be nameless, have committed a grave error in charging Anstey with borrowing from Smollett; whereas The New Bath Guide was published in 1766, whilst Humphrey Clinker was not written until 1770, and was published in 1771.

In 1820 he was appointed adjunct Professor of Languages in Columbia College, New York, and in 1835 he was advanced to the station filled for many years by Professor Moore, and vacated by his resignation. He received the degree of LL.D. from his Alma Mater in 1831. Mr. Anthom's publications have been numerous. His edition of Lempriere's Classical Dictionary, was very favourably received, and immediately republished in England. In 1830 appeared his larger edition of Horace, with various readings, and a copious commentary; a smaller edition was published in 1833. In 1835, in connection with the publishing house of the Messrs. Harper, Professor Anthom projected a classical series, which should comprise as well the text-books used in academies and schools preparatory to college, as those usually read in colleges and universities. This series includes some of the most important Greek and Latin authors. Dr. A. has pub. larger works on Ancient Geography, Greek and Roman Antiquities, Mythology, Literature, &c., in all about 50 vols.

Dr. Anthom's Classical Series has proved one of the most successful enterprises of the kind in America.

He studied at Jesus College, Cambridge, England, and in 1790 became prebend of Finsbury in St. Paul's Cathedral. He pub. a number of Theological works, 1761-86, some of which are held in high estimation. Letter on the Prevalence of Christianity before its civil establishment: with observations on a late History of the Decline of the Roman Empire, Lon., 1778.

This is one of the many answers to the illogical insinuations of Gibbon in the above-named work.

"The author has enriched this work with many learned remarks, and especially with a catalogue of civil and ecclesiastical historians, which the reader will find to be very useful."—Bissor Watson.

Discourses on Prophecy, 2 vols., 1786.

"These discourses were read at the Warburtonian Lectures, at which the celebrated Discourses of Bishop Hurd were also delivered; and are not unworthy of the object which the learned prelate had in view in the establishment of that foundation. The topics embraced by Dr. Apthorp are, the history of prophecy; Canons of Interpretation; prophecies of the birth of Christ; chronological characters of the Messiah; theological characters of the Messiah; prophecies of the death of Christ; of the kingdom of Christ; characters of Antichrist; the mystic Tyre, and the origin and progress of the Reformation. These subjects are discussed with considerable ability and originality, and abound with clear and satisfactory views of the great doctrines of Christianity."—ORME.

"A most excellent and highly-esteemed work."—LOWNDRES.

Arbuckle, Jas., 1700-1734. 1. Hibernicus's Letters, pub. in the Dublin Journal, Lon., 1729, 2 vols. 2. Poems.

Arbuthnot, Rev. Alexander, 1538-1582, was Principal of the University of Aberdeen. He edited Buchanan's History of Scotland, pub. 1582. His only production is his Orationes de Origine et Dignitate Juris, Edin., 1572. He was very serviceable to the Church of Scotland. James VI. was much displeased at his editing Buchanan's History. See Delit. Poet. Scot. for Latin verses by Thomas Maitland, and an epitaph by Andrew Melvil, both in honour of our author.

Arbuthnot, Arch. Life, &c., of Lord Lovat, Lon., 1746. Life, &c., of Miss Jenny Cameron, Lon., 1746.

Arbuthnot, John, M.D., 1675-1734-5, was a native of Arbuthnot, near Montrose. He studied at the College of Aberdeen, where he took his degree of M.D. Upon his removal to London, his uncommon powers of wit and ripe scholarship introduced him to the society of the principal literary characters of the day, with whom he was a great favourite. For some time he supported himself by teaching mathematics. In 1697, Dr. Woodward pub. an Essay towards a natural history of the Earth, in which he threw out some singular views respecting the Deluge. Arbuthnot attacked this Essay with great success in an Examination of Dr. W.'s Account, &c., which at once established his fame. In 1700, he pub. a treatise On the Usefulness of Mathematical Learning, which increased his reputation. An interesting paper On the Regularity of the Births of both Sexes, (a most conclusive proof of a superintending Providence,) procured his election in 1704 into the Royal Society. In 1712 appeared the first part of The History of John Bull, intended to ridicule Marlborough, and dissatisfy the nation with the war. There "never was a political allegory managed with more exquisite humour, or with a more skillful adaptation of characters and circumstances." Swift, in his Journal to Stella, and Pope, in Spence's Anecdotes, both attribute this work to Arbuthnot, and certainly their testimony should settle the question. Arbuthnot published a number of other works, the most celebrated of which was Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures; 2d ed., 1727. "Although there are several inaccuracies in it, which could hardly be avoided in so intricate a subject, it is a work of great merit, and has ever since been considered as the standard authority."—Encyc. Britannica.

The "Miscellaneous Works of Dr. Arbuthnot," pub. in 2 vols. in 1751, were publicly denied by his son to be his father's productions.

"Positive as is this assurance, and though some few may be spurious, the style and character of many fully prove them to be genuine."—Roe's Biog. Div.

The celebrated Scriblerus Club was formed in 1714. Arbuthnot and his intimate friends, Pope, Gray, and Swift, together with Harley, Atterbury, and Congreve, were members of this brilliant circle. The object of these wits was to "ridicule all the false tastes in learning, under the character of a man of capacity enough, that had dipped into every art and science, but injudiciously in each."—POPE. The club was not of long continuance, but we have as its fruits, The First Book of Martinus Scriblerus, The Travels of Gulliver, and The Art of Sinking in Poetry.

"There seems to be every reason to believe, that of the three pieces, Arbuthnot was the sole author of the first, Swift of the second, and Pope of the last."—Retros. Review.

Dr. Johnson has asserted that no one was ever wiser, better, or merrier for reading the Memoirs of Scriblerus. During the last illness of Queen Anne, in 1714, Doctors Arbuthnot and Mead attended her majesty: to this Gay alludes in the Prologue to the Shepherd's Week:

"This leech Arbuthnot was yclept,
 Who many a night not once had slept,
 But watched our gracious sovereign still;
 For who could rest while she was ill?"

Swift replied to a lady who desired to know his opinion concerning Arbuthnot, "He has more wit than we all have, and his humanity is equal to his wit." In one of his poems, he laments that he is "Far from his kind Arbuthnot's aid,

 Who knows his art, but not his trade."

Dr. Johnson, when talking of the eminent writers in Queen Anne's reign, observed:

"I think Dr. Arbuthnot the first man among them. He was the most universal genius, being an excellent physician, a man of deep learning, and a man of much humour."

Pope declared that he was fitter to live or die than any man he knew:

"His good morals were equal to any man's, but his wit and humour superior to all mankind."

"Oh if the world had but a dozen Arbuthnots in it, I would burn my travels! but however, he is not without fault. There is a passage in Bede highly commending the piety and learning of the Irish in that age, where, after abundance of praises, he overthrows them all, by lamenting that, alas! they kept Easter at a wrong time of the year. So our doctor has every quality and virtue that can make a man amiable and useful, but, alas! he hath a sort of slouch in his walk."—DEAN SWIFT.

This slouch in the doctor's walk is noticed in a letter from Pope to Mr. Digby, in which, after recommending Arbuthnot to Mrs. Mary Digby, he says:

"But, indeed, I fear she would not walk with him, for, as Dean Swift observed to me the very first time I saw the doctor, 'He is a man that can do every thing but walk.'"

"Although he was justly celebrated for wit and learning, there was an excellence in his character more amiable than all his other qualifications: I mean the goodness of his heart. . . . He is seldom serious, except in his attacks upon vice, and there his spirit rises with a manly strength and noble indignation."—LORD OSMAN.

Archard. Essay on the French Nobility, 1798.

Archbold, J. F., an eminent writer on Law. 1. The Practice of the Court of King's Bench, in personal Actions and Ejectments, 8th ed., by Thomas Chitty. Including the Practice of the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer, 2 vols. 12mo, Lon., 1840, '45, '47; 9th edit., adapted to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, entitled Proc. Courts Queen's Bench, 2 vols. 8vo, 1855; 2d American ed., 2 vols. 8vo, New York, 1838.

"This is the leading work on practice in England. In the United States, Tidd's Practice is probably in more general use than any other English book upon the common law practice, and 'has been universally allowed to be a model of completeness and accuracy.' The reputation of Mr. Archbold's treatise is mainly attributable to its excellent arrangement and perspicuous style. It had passed through two editions, when Mr. T. Chitty first edited the book, into which he has incorporated the changes made in the English practice, by the 'Uniformity of Process Act' and the rules and decisions consequent upon its passage. Warren's Law Studies, 752; 1 Jurist, 48."—Murray's Legal Bibl.

2. The Law and Practice in Bankruptcy, as founded on the recent statutes, 9th ed., by J. Flather, 12mo, Lon., 1842; 10th ed., 1844; 11th ed., by John Flather, 1858, 12mo. 3. A Summary of the Law relative to Pleading and Evidence in Criminal Cases, with the statutes, precedents of indictments, &c., and the evidence necessary to support them; 9th ed., by Sir J. Jervis, Knt., 12mo, Lon., 1843; 11th ed., by W. N. Welsby, 1849; 18th ed., by Welsby, Lon., 1856; 4th American ed., 8vo, New York, 1843; 5th, from 10th Lon. ed., 1846.

"Trifling as it may seem, it has cost me much time and great labour. I have taken infinite pains to simplify my subject; to reject every thing redundant or irrelevant; to compress the whole into the smallest possible compass consistent with perspicuity; and to clothe it in language plain, simple, and unadorned."

"This treatise is a standard work of great practical utility in England and America."—Murray's Legal Bibl.

4. A Digest of the Law relative to Pleadings and Evidence in Civil Actions; 2d ed., 12mo, Lon., 1837; 2d Amer. ed., from the 2d Lon. ed., N. York, 1838. 5. The New Practice of Attorneys in the Courts of Law at Westminster; with forms, including the recent statute as to attorneys; also an appendix, comprising questions of practice, 2 vols. 12mo, Lon., 1844; 3d ed., 1846, 1847.

"The author, feeling himself aggrieved at the liberties taken by Mr. Chitty, as editor of his treatise upon The Practice of the Court of Queen's Bench, appears to have prepared this book of Practice as a rival work to that altered by T. Chitty, 2 Jurist, 571."—Murray's Legal Bibl.

6. Peel's Acts, and all other Criminal Statutes, passed from 1 G. IV. to the present time, including the criminal clauses of the Reform Act, with the forms of indictments, &c., and the evidence necessary to support them; 3d ed., 2 vols. 12mo, Lon., 1835.

"Peel's Acts, and the Statutes subsequently enacted upon the subject of the Pleas of the Crown, now form nearly an entire body of Crown Law; all the great offences (with the exception of High Treason) and many of the minor offences have been made the subject of their provisions. The present edition contains the whole of the Criminal Statutes passed since the 60th George III; and each section, defining an offence, is followed by the form of the indictment, &c., and the evidence necessary to support it."—Murray's Legal Bibl.

7. Collection of Forms and Entries in the Courts of K. B. and C. P.; 2d ed., 12mo, Lon., 1828. 8. The Jurisdiction and Practice of the Court of Quarter Sessions, with forms of indictment, notices of appeals, &c., 12mo, Lon., 1836.

"This production is in part compiled from the author's previous publications. Dickinson's treatise upon the same subject, written many years since, in consequence of the many changes in the law has now little practical value. Mr. Archbold's book will be of great assistance to every professional man practising in the Court of Quarter Sessions, 1 Jurist, 61."—Murray's Legal Bibl.

9. Digest of the Laws relative to offences against God and Religion, with the Laws which affect Protestant Dissenters and Roman Catholics, with the Toleration Act, 8vo, Lon., 1813. 10. Digest of the Pleas of the Crown, 8vo, Lon., 1813.

"This is one of three volumes of a Digest of Criminal Law, that Mr. Archbold had prepared for the press, but about the time this volume was published, several similar books were issued, and the two remaining volumes never appeared. However, he has incorporated these parts of his unpublished Digest into his Summary of Pleading and Evidence in Criminal Cases, 9 V."—Murray's Legal Bibl.

11. Law relative to Commitments and Convictions by Justices of the Peace, with forms, 12mo, London, 1828.

12. Recent Criminal Statutes, with forms of indictment, notes, and index, 12mo, Lon., 1837. 13. The New Bankrupt Act, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 122, with observations, showing the alterations effected in the law and practice, arranged on the plan of, and intended as a supplement to, the 9th ed. of Archbold's Bankruptcy, &c. By John Flather, 12mo, Lon., 1842. 14. Justice of the Peace and Parish Officer, comprising the Law relative to their several duties, with all the necessary Forms of Commitments, Convictions, Orders, &c., 3d ed., 3 vols. 12mo, Lon., 1845; 4th ed., 1846; continued to 1850. The third volume of this work is also published separately under the title of Archbold's Poor Laws. 15. The Poor Laws. Comprising all the authorities to 1844; 4th ed., 8vo, Lon., 1845.

"Mr. Archbold has long since earned a fair and deserved reputation for the work of which this is the fourth edition. We think it, upon the whole, the best of the Archboldiana. . . Its complained-of defects are the citing of manuscript cases, without referring to the volumes in which they were subsequently printed, unnecessarily increasing 'the perplexing distinctions which beset this vexed branch of the law,' and the omission of the Title Bastardy."—Murray's Legal Bibl.

"Notwithstanding its occasional sins of omission and hardihood, we find far more in this book to praise than to criticize, and pronounce it, in every sense of the word, a useful work."—2 London Law Mag., N. S. 198.

16. The Law of Nisi Prius; comprising the Declarations and other Pleadings in Personal Actions, and the Evidence necessary to support them, 2 vols. 12mo, Lon., 1843; 2d ed., 1845; 3d Amer. ed., annotated by Hon. J. K. Findlay, Phila., 1853, 2 vols. 8vo.

"The plan of this work is, to give under each head precedents of the various pleadings in strict accordance with the new system; the evidence necessary to support the various issues taken; and a concise and correct statement of the general law on all the topics treated of in the work."

"Mr. Archbold has no superior as a writer of practical works, whether we regard their number, or utility, and but one equal, Mr. Chitty. This treatise is more compressed than Mr. Stephen's Nisi Prius, treating only of personal actions, as assumpsit, account, debt, &c. This work is well arranged, and valuable as far as it goes. Warren's Law Stud. 772; 26 L. O. 31."—Murray's Legal Bibl.

17. The Magistrate's Pocket Book, or an epitome of the duties and practice of a Justice of the Peace out of Sessions, alphabetically arranged, with forms of commitments; to which is added a copious and general index; 4th ed., (W. Robinson,) 1842, 12mo. 18. Practice in the Crown side of the Queen's Bench, with forms, &c., 12mo, Lon., 1844.

"This work fully sustains the reputation of Mr. Archbold, and higher praise could not well be given."—Law Times.

19. Act for the Amendment of the Poor Laws 4 and 5 Wm. IV. c. 76, with a practical introduction, notes, and forms; 5th ed., 12mo, Lon., 1839. 20. Summary of the Law relative to Appeals against orders of removal, against rates, and against orders of filiation; together with the Practice of the Court of Quarter Sessions in Appeals; 2d ed., 2 vols. 12mo, Lon., 1831. New System of Criminal Procedure, &c., 1852, 12mo; Amer. ed. by T. W. Waterman, N. York, 1852. In 1811, this useful writer published an edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, with notes, in 4 vols. royal 8vo. He is the author of several legal compilations, &c., in addition to those above noticed. For Mr. Archbold's invaluable labours the thanks of the profession, and the gratitude of the public at large, are eminently due.

Archdale, John. A new Description of the fertile and pleasant Province of Carolina, Lon., 1707. This gentleman was governor of Carolina, 1695-1701?

"A captain of a vessel from Madagascar, on his way to Great Britain, anchored off Sullivan's Island, and made a present to the governor of a bag of seed rice, which he had brought from the East. This rice the governor divided among some of his friends, who agreed to make an experiment. The success equalled their expectation, and from this small beginning arose the staple commodity of Carolina."

Archdall, Mervyn, 1723-1791, an "exemplary Protestant divine and learned antiquary," was a native of Dublin. He prepared himself, by forty years of zealous labour, for the compilation of his Monasticon Hibernicum; or, an History of the Abbeys, Priors, and other Religious Houses in Ireland, Dublin, 1786.

"It contains many particulars which will gratify the antiquary's curiosity. . . It is the more valuable on account of its being compiled from authentic official records, the truth of which cannot be called in question."—Lon. Monthly Review, 1786.

"The late learned Dr. Pocock, Bishop of Ossory and of Meath, pointed out the method here adopted, procured many necessary documents, and had the goodness to encourage the author with solid favours. . . We sincerely congratulate the sister kingdom on such a compilation."—Lon. Gentleman's Magazine, 1786.

In 1789 our learned author pub. an edition of Lodge's Peerage of Ireland, which he increased from four to seven volumes.

"The cause of the extension of the latter work, however, is attributed to Mrs. Archdall's skill in deciphering the short-hand notes of Mr. Lodge."—Rosé's Biog. Dict.

Let Mrs. Archdall's name be handed down from antiquary to antiquary to the end of time!

Archdekin, (called also Mac Gilla Cuddy,) Richard, 1619-1690? a Jesuit, was a native of Kilkenny. He pub. several theological works, which enjoyed extensive popularity. His Essay on Miracles was pub. (Louvain) 1667. The Theologicæ Tripartita Universa reached the eleventh edition in 1700. "At the time the eighth edition was undertaken, there were 16,000 copies of this work disposed of, and a great demand for more."

"It has been Archer's aim to satisfy reason, whilst he pleased, charmed, and instructed her; to impress upon the mind just notions of the mysteries and truths of the gospel; and to show that the ways of virtue are the ways of pleasantness, and her paths the paths of peace. To almost every Protestant library, and to many a Protestant toilet, these sermons have found their way."—CHARLES BUTLER.

"His method of treatment was in accordance with that proposed by Celsus and Paulus Aegineta. He superseded the cruel practice of his day, the cautery, as used by Albucasis. . . . He may be looked upon as having been the earliest to introduce a rational practice into England."

Freind and Hely give an example of his rapacity for fees in cases of operation for the fistula.

Armstrong, Geo., M.D. An Essay on the Diseases most fatal to Infants, &c., Lon. 1767. This popular work was repub. in 1771, again in 1788; and in 1808 another edition, enlarged, was pub. by A. P. Buchan, M.D.

"That part of medicine which regards the diseases of infants has hitherto lain uncultivated. I do not pretend to account for this strange neglect; nor is it to my purpose."—Preface to first edition.

"A load of medicines is in all cases to be condemned, but particularly where infants are the patients. The little essay before us is chiefly to be commended for its simplicity in this respect. Many of the observations are plain and useful; and the medicines few, efficacious, and easy to be administered."—Month. Review, 1767.

Armstrong, John, M.D., 1709?-1779, a celebrated physician and poet, was the son of a clergyman, and born in the parish of Cattleston, in Roxburghshire. He graduated at the University of Edinburgh, receiving his degree of M.D. Feb. 4th, 1732. His first poem, Winter, although written in 1725, was not published until 1770, thirty-five years after his earliest production. A Dialogue between Hygieia, Mercury, and Pluto. The work which established his fame was The Art of Preserving Health, Lon., 1744. Benevolence, a poetical Epistle to Eumenes, appeared seven years later, and in 1753 he gave to the world, Taste, an Epistle to a young Critic. The Art of Preserving Health has been warmly commended by many eminent authorities. Warton praises it for classical correctness; Dr. Beattie predicted that it would "make him known and esteemed by posterity;" but adds, "And I presume he will be more esteemed if all his other works perish with him."

"To describe so difficult a thing, gracefully and poetically, as the effects of distemper on a human body, was reserved for Dr. Armstrong, who accordingly hath executed it at the end of his third book of his Art of Preserving Health, where he hath given us that pathetic account of the sweating sickness. There is a classical correctness and closeness of style in this poem, that are truly admirable, and the subject is raised and adorned by numberless poetical images."—Dr. Warton's Reflections on Didactic Poetry.

A Short Ramble through France and Italy in 1771; Med. Essays, 1773, 4to.

Churchill was so enraged at Armstrong's styling him a "bouncing mimic," in his Epistle to John Wilkes, that he attacked him most savagely in his poem of The Journey.

Armstrong was of a very querulous temper; and his friend Thomson, the author of The Seasons, remarks, "The doctor does not decrease in spleen; but there is a certain kind of spleen that is both humane and agreeable, like Jacques's in the play."

Armstrong, John, M.D., 1784–1829, took the degree of doctor of medicine of the University of Edinburgh in June, 1808. 1. Facts and Observations relative to Puerperal Fever, Lon., 1814. 2. Practical Illustrations of Typhus and other Febrile Diseases, 1816. 3. Practical Illustrations of the Scarlet Fever, &c., 1818. The second-named work went through three large editions in three successive years, and conferred great celebrity upon its author. The last named publication reached its second edition before the expiration of the year, (1818.)

"Armstrong was a man of genius; but his attempted contempt of learning much disfigures his orations. He never failed to embrace any opportunity to hold up to ridicule the learning of schools and colleges, and to treat with neglect the claims of learned practitioners."—Rose's Eng. Dict.

Arnald, Richard, 1696?–1756, a Fellow of Emmanuel College, Camb., pub. a number of works, chiefly theological, 1726–1752. He is best known as the author of the Commentary on the Apocryphal Writings, which generally accompanies the Commentaries of Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby.

"A judicious and valuable work."—LOWNDZ.

"This valuable commentary is deservedly held in high estimation."—T. H. HOARE.

"The five volumes by Patrick, Lowth, and Arnald contain the best commentary on the Old Testament and the Apocrypha which we have in the English language."—BISHOP WATSON.

In the 2d edition, Arnald's Commentary was enriched by the notes of Jeremiah Markland, for an account of which, and of the literary character of Arnald, see Nichols's Literary Anecdotes.

The Commentaries of Patrick, Lowth, Whitby, Lowman, and Arnald have been published together in four royal 8vo volumes, and form a valuable manual for the student. In this connexion, we notice the excellent Comprehensive Commentary, in six volumes, edited by Rev. Dr. Jenks, of Boston, U. States of America. Published by J. B. Lippincott & Co. We consider it the best Family Commentary in the language, and admirably adapted to the wants of Bible-class and Sunday-school teachers.

Arne, Thos. Augustine, 1710–1778, a celebrated musical composer, is of interest to literary men from his being the son of Thomas Arne, the upholsterer, the person supposed to have been intended by Addison in his character of the Politician, in Nos. 155 and 160 of The Tatler. In 1738 Arne produced music for Milton's masque of Comus.

"In this masque he introduced a light, airy, original, and pleasing melody, wholly different from Purcell and Handel, whom all English composers had hitherto pillaged or imitated. Indeed, the melody of Arne at this time, and of his Vauxhall songs afterwards, forms an era in English music; it was so easy, natural, and agreeable to the whole kingdom, that it had an effect upon our national taste."—DR. BURNBY.

The well-known song of "Rule Britannia" was first introduced in Mallet's masque of Alfred, set by Arne in 1740.

"The general melody of our countryman, if analyzed, would perhaps appear to be neither Italian nor English, but an agreeable mixture of Italian, English, and Scots. . . . From the death of Purcell to that of Arne—a period of more than fourscore years—no candidate for musical fame among our countrymen had appeared, who was equally admired by the nation at large."—*DR. Arnold, Matthew, a son of Dr. Thomas Arnold, of Rugby, b. Dec. 24, 1822, at Satcham, near Staines, Middlesex, England, educated at Winchester, Rugby, and Oxford, and elected a Fellow of Oriel College in 1845. In 1847 he became private secretary to Lord Lansdowne, and he retained that position until his marriage in 1851, when he was appointed to the post which he now occupies,—Lay Inspector of Schools under the Committee of the Council of Education. He was elected Prof. of Poetry in Univ. of Oxford, 1857. 1. The Strayed Reveller, and other Poems, by A., Lon., 1848. "For combined culture and fine natural feeling in the matter of versification, Mr. Arnold has no living superior. Though sometimes slovenly in the versification of his smaller poems, when he is put upon his mettle by a particular affection for his subject, he manages the most 'irregular' and difficult metres with admirable skill and feeling."—*Edin. Arnold, or Arnolde, Richard, an ancient English chronicler, compiler of a work, the first edition of which is very rare: The Names of the Balyfs, Custos, Mayres, and Sherifs of ye Cite of London from the Tyme of Kyng Richard the first, &c., (1502?) This book is commonly called Arnold's Chronicle. The second edition, published circa 1521, is also of rare occurrence; a copy sold at the sale of George Mason's library, in 1798, for £15 15s. 6d. The basis of the Chronicle is supposed to be the MS. in the town-clerk's office, (London,) known as the Liber de Antiquis Legibus. An edition was published in 1811, (London,) with introductory matter entitled, The Customs of London, otherwise called Arnold's Chronicle. See this preface, by that eminent antiquary, Francis Douce, for a discussion as to the origin of the celebrated poem, The Not-Brown (Nut-Brown) Mayde, (which appeared first in Arnold's Chronicle), modernised by Prior into the ballad of Henry and Emma.

"This is perhaps the most heterogeneous and multifarious miscellany that ever existed. The collector sets out with a catalogue of the mayors and sheriffs, the customs and charter of the city of London. Soon afterwards we have receipts to pickle sturgeon, to make vinegar, ink, and gunpowder; how to raise parsley in an hour; the arts of brewery and soap-making; an estimate of the livings in London; an account of the last visitation of Saint Magnus's Church; the weight of Essex cheese; and a letter to Cardinal Wolsey. The Not-Brown Mayde is introduced between an estimate of some subsidies paid into the exchequer, and directions for buying goods in Flanders."—Warren's History of English Poetry.

For a further description of this work, see Herbert's Ames's Typ. Antiq., the Censura Litteraria, and especially the table of contents of this curious olla podrida in Oldys's British Librarian, p. 22.

"Arnolds was a citizen of London, who, being inflamed with the fervent love of good learning, travelled very studiously therein, and principally in observing matters worthy to be remembered of the posterity; he noted the charters, liberties, laws, constitutions, and customs of the city of London."—Srowe.

"Arnolds of London wrote certayne collections touching historical matters."—HOLLINSHED.

He is supposed to have died circa 1521.

Arnold, Samuel, 1740-1802, a celebrated musical composer, son of Baron Arnold. His published works are very considerable in number, viz:

"4 oratorios, 8 odes, 3 serenades, 47 operas, 3 burlettas, besides overtures, concertos, and many smaller pieces."—WARR.

His most famous oratorio was that of the Prodigal Son. "His oratorios are not unworthy of the disciple of so great a master as Handel."—Rees's Cyclopaedia.

At the particular request of Geo. III., he superintended the pub. of a magnificent edition of all the works of Handel, in score, of which he completed 36 folio volumes.

Arnold, Samuel J., son of the above, pub. a number of dramatic pieces. We find 12 credited to him in the Biog. Dram.: 1. Auld Robin Gray, 1794. 2. Who Pays the Reckoning? 1795. 3. Shipwreck, 1796. 4. Irish Legacy, 1797. 5. Veteran Tar, 1801. 6. Foul Deeds will Rise, 1804. 7. Prior Claim, (in conj. with Mr. Pye), 1805. 8. Up all Night, 1809, N. P. 9. Britain's Jubilee, 1809, N. P. 10. Arnold, Thomas, D.D., 1795-1842, head master of Rugby School, from 1827 till his death, and successor of Dr. Nares (in 1841) as Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford, was one of the brightest ornaments of his age. He was educated at Winchester School, and from thence went, in 1811, to Corpus Christi College, Oxf., where he took a first class in Classics, in Easter term, 1814. In the next year he gained the prize for an English Essay, and in 1817, being then a Fellow of Oriel College, he gained the Latin Essay. The principal works of Dr. Arnold are his History of Rome, (unfinished); The Later Roman Commonwealth; Lectures on Modern History; and Sermons, in 3 volumes. He published an edition of Thucydides, which has been highly commended, as an evidence of ripe scholarship and critical acumen. As a teacher, he laboured to instil into the minds of his scholars those religious principles, founded upon a just sense of responsibility to God and to society, which so eminently shone forth in his own "walk and conversation."

"He will strike those who study him more closely as a complete character—complete in its union of moral and intellectual gifts, and in the steady growth and development of both: for his great ness did not consist in the pre-eminence of any single quality, but in several remarkable powers, thoroughly leavened and pervaded by an ever-increasing moral nobleness."—Lon. Quarterly Rev., lxxiv. 507.

The Edinburgh Review, comparing Arnold to Milton, remarks:

"There is the same purity and directness about them both: the same predominance of the graver, not to say, sterner, elements; the same confidence, vehemence, and elevation. They both so lived in their 'great Task-Master's eye' as to verify Bacon's observation. In his Essay on Atheism, 'made themselves of kin to God in spirit, and raised their nature by means of a higher nature than their own.'"

"As a writer, Dr. Arnold was remarkable for vigorous thought, clearness of expression, and purity of style. His edition of Thucydides, and his (unfinished) History of Rome, are works which will always hold a high place in our literature."—Lon. Gent. Mag., August, 1852.

"His correspondence is the best record of his life and affords the most vivid representation of his character. It presents us with the progressive development of his mind and views till the one reaches the vigour and the other the comprehensiveness for which at length they became distinguished. He combined the intellectual and the moral in a degree and with a harmony rarely found. The most strongly-marked feature of his intellect was the strength and clearness of his conceptions. It seemed the possession of an inward light so intense that it penetrated on the instant every subject laid before him, and enabled him to grasp it with the vividness of sense and the force of reality. Hence, what was said of his religious impressions may be used to characterize his intellectual operations: 'he knew what others only believed; he saw what others only talked about.' Hence also, perhaps, arose in a great measure the vehemence with which he opposed views and notions contrary to his own."—Knight's Eng. Cyc., Biog., vol. 1.

"Mr. Arthur's writings, though not of a very high order, have yet generally had a certain genial character and domestic tone which have given them a wide circulation. The new volume before us, however, is calculated to be very mischievous. The author verges on Spiritualism, Swedenborgianism, and Reichsbachism, if not actually engulfed."—N.Y. Criticism.

Ascham, or Askam, Anthony, a physician and ecclesiastic, was the author of A lytel Treatise of Astronomy, Lon., 1552, which ran through many editions.

"It is a very poorly-written tract, and scarcely deserves a notice in the real history of English science."

A Little Herbal of the Properties of Herbes, Lon., 1550.

Ascham, Anthony, murdered 1650, at Madrid, by six English Royalists, was the author of a work entitled Of the Confusion and Revolutions of Government, &c., Lon., 1648. Bishop Sanderson wrote a censure of this work.

Ascham, Roger, 1515?-1568, was born at Kirby-Wiske, a village near Northallerton, in Yorkshire. In 1530, he entered St. John's Coll., Cambridge, where he displayed great aptness in acquiring the Greek and Latin languages. Dr. Metcalf, the master, he informs us, was "a man meanly learned himself, but not meanly affectioned to set forward learning in others, and I lacked not his favour to further me in learning." In the 18th year of his age he was chosen Fellow of his college. In 1544 he succeeded Sir John Cheke as public orator of the University of Cambridge, and was made by King Edward VI. his secretary for the Latin tongue. In the controversy concerning the right pronunciation of the Greek language, Ascham opposed the method introduced by Sir Thomas Smith and Sir John Cheke, but afterwards espoused their opinion and practice. "It is probable that it is in part owing to the ingenuity with which he defended it, (see his letter to Hubertus Languetus,) that this mode of pronunciation was generally adopted, and has since prevailed in the schools of England." In 1548, the Princess Elizabeth called Ascham from his college to direct her studies. He instructed his pupil in the learned languages with great diligence and success for two years, during which time he read with her the greater part of Cicero and Livy, the select orations of Socrates, the plays of Sophocles, and the Greek Testament.

In 1550, he travelled for three years on the Continent, as secretary to Sir Richard Morysine, who was appointed ambassador to the Emperor Charles V. Who that has ever perused it can forget his deeply-interesting description of his visit, before his departure, to Lady Jane Grey? The place at which she then resided was her father's seat at Broadgate, in Leicestershire. Ascham found that the hall was deserted: the family were engaged in hunting in the park, and he discovered, after some search, Lady Jane, then in her 14th year, in her apartment, deeply immersed in the Phædo of Plato! "with as much delight as some gentlemen would read a merry tale in Boccaccio." The worthy Ascham, however delighted at such devotion to the studies he was himself so much in love with, could not conceal his surprise at the choice of this very young lady. After the first compliments, he asked her why she "lost such pastime as there must needs be in the park?" At which, smiling, she answered, "I wist all their sport is but a shadow to that pleasure that I find in Plato. Alas, good folk! they never felt what true pleasure meant!" This "naturally leading him to inquire how a child of her age had attained to such a depth of pleasure both in the Platonic language and philosophy," she made him (Mr. Ascham himself tells us) the following remarkable reply: "I will tell you," quoth she, "and tell you truth, which, perchance, you will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits which ever God gave me, is that he sent so sharp and severe parents, and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand or go; eat, drink, be merry, or sad; be sewing, playing, dancing, or doing any thing else, I must do it, as it were, in such weight, measure, and number, and even so perfectly, as God made the world, or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea, presently, sometimes with pinches, nips, and bobs, (or other ways, which I will not name, for the honour I bear them,) so without measure disordered, that I think myself in hell, till time come that I must go to Mr. Elmer, who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing while I am with him; and when I am called from him, I fall a-weeping, because whatsoever I do else but learning, is full of grief, trouble, fear, and wholly misliking unto me; and this my book hath been so much my pleasure, and bringeth daily to me more pleasure, and more yet!

In respect to it, all other pleasures, in very deed, be but trifles and troubles unto me!"—Ascham's Schoolmaster. Ascham dwells with great pleasure upon this interview in an epistle to his friend Sturmius. This learned young lady promised to write him a letter in Greek upon condition of his sending her one first from the emperor's court. In a letter to Lady Jane, he assures her that, among all the agreeable varieties which he had met with in his travels abroad, nothing had occurred to raise his admiration like that incident in the preceding summer, when he found her, a young maiden, by birth so noble, in the absence of her tutor, and in the sumptuous house of her most noble father, at a time, too, when all the rest of the family, both male and female, were regaling themselves with the pleasures of the chase—"I found," continues he, "O Jupiter and all ye gods! I found, I say, the divine virgin diligently studying the divine Phædo in the original Greek. Happier certainly in this respect than in being descended, both on the father and mother's side, from kings and queens." On the accession of Queen Mary, he was appointed Latin secretary to her Majesty, the same post which he held formerly under Edward VI., and, subsequently, under Elizabeth. No better proof is needed of his facility in Latin composition. Of this we have sufficient evidence in the fact that in three days he wrote forty-seven despatches to foreign personages of the highest rank, on the subject of electing Cardinal Pole to the papal chair. In 1554, he resigned his Fellowship, and married Miss Margaret Howe, a young lady of good family.

His last illness has been ascribed to too close application to the composition of a Latin poem, which he designed for the Queen on the New-Year's day of 1569. He expired on the 30th December, 1568, "universally lamented." Queen Elizabeth was one of the loudest mourners, and declared that she would "rather have lost ten thousand pounds than her tutor Ascham." He was interred in St. Sepulchre's Church; and his funeral sermon was preached by Dr. Alex. Nowel, Dean of St. Paul's. Buchanan drew a character of his friend in the following epigram:

"Aschamum extinctum patrie Græcæque
Et Latine versum prætate dolent.
Principibus vixit carus, jucundus amicis,
Re modica; in mores dicere fama nequit."

Anthony Wood speaks of him as "leaving behind him this character by a learned person, that he inter primos nostræ nationis literas Latinas et Græcas, styliq; puritatem cum eloquentiæ laude excoluit."

"He had a facile and fluent Latin style, (not like those who, counting obscurity to be elegance, weed out all the hard words they meet in authors:) witness his 'Epistles,' which some say are the only Latin ones extant of any Englishman, and if so, the more the pity. What loads have we of letters from foreign pens, as if no author were complete without those necessary appendances! Whilst surely our Englishmen write (though not so many) as good as any other nation. In a word, his 'Toxophilus' is accounted a good book for young men, his 'Schoolmaster' for old men, his 'Epistles' for all men."—Fuller's Worthies.

Ascham's first publication (not his first work) was elicited by the censure with which some meddlesome people thought proper to rebuke his love of archery. It is entitled "Toxophilus; the School and Partitions of Shooting." (1544.) The author embraced the opportunity thus presented of teaching to his countrymen the as yet undeveloped riches of their native tongue.

"He designed not only to teach the art of shooting, but to give an example of diction more natural and more truly English than was used by the common writers of that age, whom he censures for mingling exotic terms with their native language, and of whom he complains that they were made authors, not by skill or education, but by arrogance and temerity. He has not failed in either of his purposes."—Dr. Johnson.

He has been called "The Father of English Prose."

Certain it is that "previous to the exertions of Ascham, very few writers can be mentioned as affording any model for English style. If we except the translation of Froissart by Bouchier, Lord Berners, in 1520, and the History of Richard III., by Sir Thomas More, certainly compositions of great merit, we shall find it difficult to produce an author of much value for his vernacular prose. On the contrary, very soon after the appearance of the 'Toxophilus,' we find harmony and beauty in English style emphatically praised and enjoined."—Dr. Drake.

So unfashionable was it at this time for the learned to condescend to the use of English, that Ascham prefaces his work by an apology for writing in his own language, doubting not that he should be blamed for "Writing it in the English tongue. . . . As for the Latin or Greek tongue, every thing is so excellently done in them, that none can do better; in the English tongue, contrary, every thing in a manner so meanly both for the matter and handling, that no man can do worse. . . . He that will write well in any tongue must follow this counsel of Aristotle: to speak as the common people do, to think as wise men do: as so should every man understand him, and the judgment of wise men allow him."

The book is a dialogue supported by Philologus, a student, and Toxophilus, a lover of archery. We have a modification of the practice of the art, the regulations which should govern it, and its inestimable advantages for various purposes. The modest archer, with true humility, acknowledges that he had not done his weighty subject full justice.

Tox.: "This communication handled of me, Philologe, as I know well, not perfectly, yet, as I suppose truly, you must take in good words; wherein, if divers things do not altogether please you, thanke yourself, which would rather have me faulte in mere follye, to take that thinge in hand, which I was not able for to performe, than by any shameshewness with-saye your request and minde, which I know well I have not satisfied."

The enthusiastic son of the bow, with an admirable stroke of policy, lets his friend understand that he has no desire to monopolize "The seat of Gamaliel," but he will be glad "to occupy the place of the unlearned," and promises to be a patient auditor when Philologe shall himself think proper to "hold forth."

"But yet I will thinke this labour of myne the better bestowed, if to-morrow, or some other day when you have leysure, you will spende as much time with me here in this same place, in entreating the question de origine animæ, and the joyning of it with the bodye, that I maye knowe howe farre Plato, Aristotle, and the Stylians have waded in it."

The worthy Philologe would be hard-hearted indeed not to be exceedingly amiable on the reception of so delicate a compliment as this; accordingly he replies, with evident complacency:

"How you have handled this matter, Toxophile, I may not well tell you myselfe now, but for your gentleness and good-will towards learninge and shootinge, I will be content to shewe you anye pleasure whensoever you will; and nowe the sunne is downe, therefore, if it please you, we will go home and drinke in my chamber, and then I will tell you plainly what I thinke of this communication, and also what dayes we will appointe, at your request, for the other matter to meete here, againe."

"The Schole Master," pub. 1571, (colophon, 1573,) was written at the suggestion of Sir Richard Sackville. The title of this excellent work is the best indication of its object.

"The Schole Master, or plaine and perite way of teaching children to understand, write, and speak, the Latin Tongue, but specially purposed for the private bringing up of Youth in Gentlemen and Noblemen's houses, and commodious also for all such as have forgot the Latin Tongue, and would by themselves, without a schole master, in short time, and with small paines, recover a sufficient habilitie to understand, write, and speak Latin. At London, printed by John Deye, dwelling over Aldersgate, Lon., 1571."

"A book that will be always useful, and everlastingly esteemed on account of the good sense, judicious observations, excellent characters of ancient authors, and many pleasant and profitable passages of English history, which are plentifully strewed therein."—DR. CAMPBELL.

"Perhaps the best advice that ever was given for the study of languages."—DR. JOHNSON.

"A more interesting and judicious treatise has not appeared upon the subject in any language."—DR. DRAKE.

"The work is strongly expressive of the author's humanity and good sense, and abounds with proofs of extensive and accurate erudition. It contains excellent practical advice, particularly on the method of teaching classical learning."—Cunningham's Biog. History.

"The writings of the learned and judicious Ascham possess, both in style and matter, a value which must not be measured by their inconsiderable bulk. Their language is pure, idiomatic, vigorous English; they exhibit great variety of knowledge, remarkable sagacity, and sound common sense."—SPALDING.

"Ascham is a thorough-bred philologist, and of the purest water. . . . After Ascham and Wilson, we look in vain, during the middle of the sixteenth century, for any names equally illustrious in the annals of English philology."—DR. DIBDIN.

"Ascham is a great name in our national literature. He was one of the first founders of a true English style in prose composition, and one of the most respectable and useful of our scholars. He was amongst the first to reject the use of foreign words and idioms—a fashion, which in the reign of Henry the Eighth, began to be so prevalent, that the authors of that day, by 'using strange wordes, as Latine, Frenche, and Italian, did make all thinges darke and harde.' . . . As a scholar, he was acute, learned, and laborious."—Retros. Review, vol. iv. p. 76.

It is truly remarkable that the English works of Ascham seem for so long a period to have been almost entirely forgotten! Dr. Johnson truly remarks:

"That his English works have been so long neglected. Is a proof of the uncertainty of literary fame. He was scarcely known as an author in his own language till Mr. Upton published his School-Master with learned notes. His other pieces were read only by those few who delight in obsolete books."

The Life of Ascham, and the Dedication to the Earl of Shaftesbury, prefixed to Bennet's edition of his English works, (Lon., 1761,) were written by Dr. Johnson.

Apologia pro Cœna Dominica contra Missam, &c., Londini, 1577. With dedication to the Earl of Leicester, some hexameters, and an epistle to the reader. Reprint, 1587.

Queen Elizabeth. Reprinted, 1581. Ibid. edidit Elstob. Oxon., 1703, with a frontispiece by M. Burghers, containing ten English portraits, and the author reading to Queen Elizabeth. Considered the best edition of the Letters: poems not included. These Letters are held in great esteem for style and matter, and are one of the few classical collections of the kind written by Englishmen. Warton considers that "the Latinity of Ascham's prose has little elegance," but we have seen Buchanan's commendation in the Epigram quoted ante.

A Report and Discourse of the Affaires and State of Germany, and the Emperor Charles his Court, during certaine years, (1550–1552.) The result of Ascham's personal observations when attached to the embassy to the emperor. Dr. Campbell praises this Report as "One of the most delicate pieces of history that ever was penned in our language, evincing its author to have been a man as capable of shining in the cabinet as in the closet."

One of the two editions bears date 1570, the other is sine anno.

Asgill, John. An Apologetical Oration, on an extraordinary occasion, Lon., 1760.

"A pretty respectable defence of Lord George Sackville."—WARR.

Asgill, John, d. 1738, at an advanced age, was a lawyer, and the author of a number of books, pub. Lon., 1700–1727. He is remarkable as having been subjected to much persecution in consequence of a work pub. in 1700, entitled Argument, proving that Men may be translated to Heaven without dying, according to the Covenant of Eternal Life, revealed in the Scriptures, although the Human Nature of Christ himself could not thus be translated till he had passed through Death. This unfortunate publication, which a later judgment has pronounced rather absurd than impious, was condemned by Dr. Sacheverell as "one of the blasphemous writings which induced him to think the church in danger." He sat as a member of the Irish House of Commons only four days, when he was expelled for this performance. Returning to England he was chosen member for Bramber, county of Sussex, in 1705. In 1707, he was expelled from his seat upon a representation of a committee of which Edward Harley, Esq., was chairman, that the book "contained several blasphemous expressions, and seemed to be intended to ridicule the Scriptures."

"From this time his affairs grew more desperate, and he was obliged to retire first to the Mint, and then became a prisoner in the King's Bench, but removed himself thence to the Fleet, and in the rules of one or other of these prisons continued thirty years."

Among the principal of his works were: Several Assertions Proved, in order to create another Species of Money than Gold or Silver. An Essay on a Registry for Titles of Lands, 1771. This work is written in a very humorous style. The Succession of the House of Hanover Vindicated, Lon., 1714. This was an answer to Mr. Bedford's famous book. Dr. Southey is disposed to think that Asgill's theological treatise which gave so much offence, was the result of a professional habit of mind, which led him to take nothing for granted, but induced him to examine every question critically for his own satisfaction.

"The whole strength of his mind was devoted to his profession, in which he had so completely trammelled and drilled his intellectual powers, that he at length acquired a habit of looking at all subjects in a legal point of view. He could find flaws in an hereditary crown. But it was not to seek flaws that he studied the Bible; he studied it to see whether he could not claim, under the Old and New Testament, something more than was considered to be his share."

For copious extracts from Asgill's Argument, see The Doctor: part the Second. Asgill, in contending that men had made a great mistake in dying for so many years, only because they thought they were obliged to die, had to admit that the evidence told strongly against him! He was not able to deny that "this custom of the world to die, hath gained such a prevalency over our minds by prepossessing us of the necessity of death, that it stands ready to swallow my argument whole without digesting it." Yet nothing daunted by this startling fact, of men's daily insisting upon dying, he stoutly contends that "the custom of the world to die is no argument one way or other!" He explains all this in a trice, by declaring that the dominion of death is supported by our fear of it, "by which it hath bullied the world to this day." We have seen that his ungrateful contemporaries, not appreciating his friendly efforts to extend their longevity, punished, instead of rewarding, him, and insisted upon following their old custom with that pertinacious adherence to the manners of their forefathers for which Englishmen have been always proverbial. Asgill no doubt pitied their delusion, and deplored their folly, as he saw them dropping off one by one; and as he is said to have almost attained his 100th year, perhaps the new generation were beginning to suspect that Lawyer Asgill was not so far wrong after all, and that their progenitors had the weak side of an argument to which they had yielded themselves martyrs. But death had only "stayed execution," not "abandoned his claim;" and, in November, 1738, Asgill was forced to be a witness against himself, and, to use old Anthony Wood's favourite phrase, he "gave way to fate," to prove, we trust, the truth of the old motto which he so much censured, that "Death is the Gate of Life," the entrance to a blissful immortality, to those who by "patient continuance in well-doing, have waited their appointed time till their change come," justified, sanctified, and made meet for the "inheritance of the saints in light." We believe Asgill to have been a good man, but one who had

"Found it pleasant

To sail, like Pyrrho, on a sea of speculation," until fancy had usurped the province of reason, and the deductions of judgment been displaced by the vagaries of the imagination.

Ashmole, Elias, 1617–1693, the founder of the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, a celebrated philosopher, antiquary, and chemist, was born at Lichfield, in Staffordshire. In 1641 he became attorney of the Common Pleas. In 1644 he entered himself of Brasenose College, Oxford, where he zealously devoted himself to the study of Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and Astronomy. Upon his return to London, he became an associate of Moore, Lilly, Booker, and other astrologers and Rosicrucianists, the effects of which studies were seen by his publication, in 1650, of Dr. Arthur Dee's Fasciculus Chemicus; together with another tract of the same character, by an unknown author. In 1652 appeared his Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum, a collection of the works of such English Chemists as had remained in manuscript. In a letter to Mr. (afterwards Sir William) Dugdale, whom he accompanied in his Survey of the Fens, he gives an account of the Roman Road called Benneranna, in Antoninus's Itinerary. In 1655 or 1658 he began to collect materials for his History of the Institutions, Laws, and Ceremonies of the most Noble Order of the Garter, which he published in 1672: upon presenting a copy to King Charles II., he granted him a privy seal for £400. In 1679 he lost, by a fire, a collection of 9000 coins, a fine library, and many curiosities. In 1682, the University of Oxford having prepared a building for their reception, he sent thither his collection of coins, medals, &c.; and at his death the Ashmolean Museum was still further enriched by the bequest of the books and MSS. of the learned founder. His History of Berkshire was published after his death (in 1715) in 3 vols. folio, and is not thought to do the author justice.

"He was the greatest virtuous and curious that ever was known or read of in England before his time. Uxor Solis took up his habitation in his breast, and in his bosom the great God did abundantly store up the treasures of all sorts of wisdom and knowledge. Much of his time, when he was in the prime of his years, was spent in chemistry; in which faculty, being accounted famous, he did worthily deserve the title of Mercurio philus Anglicus."—Wood's Athen. Oxon.

Ashmole's Diary, reprinted at the end of Lilly's History of his Life and Times in 1774, "abounds so much in absurd and whimsical facts as to be almost an injury to Ashmole's memory." Ashmole was thrice married; his third wife was the daughter of his friend, Sir William Dugdale. The History of the Order of the Garter

"Was his greatest undertaking, and had he published nothing else, would have preserved his memory, as it certainly is, in its kind, one of the most valuable books in our language."—CHALMERS.

The work "obtained great applause, not only from his majesty, but from all the Knights Companions, and others attached to studies of that kind."

Among other Knights Companions who testified their approbation of our author's performance, was Christierne, King of Denmark, who sent to Ashmole a gold chain with a medal hanging to it.

"Whereupon Mr. Ashmole showing it to his majesty, his majesty commanded him to wear it; which he accordingly did in some public assemblies that followed. . . . Frederick William, Prince Elector of the Empire, was so exceedingly taken with it, that he not only sent to the author a golden chain of 90 Philagreen links, in great knots most curiously worked, with a gold medal hanging to it, containing on one side his father's picture, and on the other an escutcheon of his arms, but took order that it should be translated into the Dutch language; but whether it was so, I cannot yet tell, for I have not yet seen it."—Wood.

For an analysis of this work, see Oldys's British Librarian, p. 119-26; and see an interesting correspondence between Earl Harcourt and Richard Gough, in Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, vol. vi. p. 324, in which the subject of females wearing the Order of the Garter is considered. In Thoresby's Diary, we find a notice calculated to excite pensive emotions, of a visit paid by him to the former residence of Ashmole:

"June 1, 1712. In our return, passing by the house where Mr. Ashmole once lived, we visited the widow, who showed us the remains of Mr. Tradescant's rarities, amongst which some valuable shells and Indian curiosities."

With what delight would the master of these "rarities," the great "virtuous and curious," have displayed them to this kindred spirit! How would he have expatiated upon those wonderful "Coynes and Meddals" which Anthony Wood describes with such true antiquarian gusto! Like Heseliah, he would doubtless have "shewed them all the house of his precious things, the silver and the gold, and the spices and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures: there was nothing in his house" that he would have "shewed them not." But let us not forget, that although it was a woman's province to gratify the erudite taste of Ralph Thoresby, by displaying these antiquarian rarities, that woman was the widow of Elias Ashmole and the daughter of Sir William Dugdale!

"This Mr. Ashwell, who was a quiet and pious man, and every way worthy of his function, had been an excellent logician, and of a very rational head and understanding, was also well read in the Fathers and Schoolmen, and, therefore, very much valued by Divines whose learning lay that way."

Ashwell, John, Prior of Newnham Abbey, near Bedford. "The Letters which Johan Ashwell, Priour of Newnham Abbey besydes Bedford, sente secretly to the Byshope of Lyncolne. M.D.XXXVII. "At Straszburge 10 Daye of June. Thys lyttell Boke be delywered to Johan Ashwell, Priour of Newnham Abbey, besydes Bedforde, with Spede."

This work is of great interest, not only to the bibliographer, and lover of rare works, but as connected with the history of one of the first men who stood forth in England, and boldly advocated the "universal diffusion" of the gospel. The Prior of Newnham accused Joye of heresy, and Joye answers the charge.

"He was a great friend to Master Tindall, and, therefore, perfectly hated by Wolsey, Fisher, and Sir Thomas More. The particulars of his sufferings, if known, would justly advance him into the reputation of a confessor. He translated some parts of the Bible into English, and wrote many works, reckoned up by Bale. Notwithstanding many machinations against his life, he found his coffin where he fetched his cradle, 'in sua patria sepultus,' being peaceably buried in his native country, 1553, the last year of King Edward the Sixth."—Fuller's Worthies.

Ashew, Anthony, M.D., 1723-1772, a distinguished classical scholar, was educated at Sedburgh School, and Emmanuel Coll., Cambridge. He studied medicine for a year at Leyden, after which he still remained abroad for three years, and returned to Cambridge in 1750, and commenced practice. He published no medical works, and his easy fortune prevented the necessity of any effort to obtain the large professional business which his father, Dr. Adam Ashew, had long enjoyed. Whilst abroad, he laid the foundation of his choice library by the purchase of many valuable books and manuscripts. Amongst these treasures was a complete collection of the editions of Alcibiades, a new edition of which Dr. Ashew intended to have given to the world. Whilst yet a student at Leyden, he issued a specimen of his intended edition, dedicated to Dr. Richard Mead Novæ Editionis Tragicarum Alcibiadis Specimen, curante Antonio Ashew, Ac., Lond. Batav., 1746. This pamphlet is now of great rarity.

Ashew has been properly esteemed one of the fathers of the "BIBLIOMANIA" in England. He estimated his rare books and dingy manuscripts as more precious than rubies or fine gold, and was careful how he permitted them to pass from his own hands. We have an amusing account of his displaying (but not exhibere only—monstrare was too much for a king to ask) to his visitors some of his choicest volumes, safely enshrined within glass cases, whilst the happy owner, perched upon his library ladder, would read from an "Edictio princeps," or an "Exemplar elegans," some scrap of philosophic wisdom of the "elder time." How could the enthusiastic Ashew ever resign those darlings of his soul! But Death, who has no respect for men's "hobbies," and who stops not to ask, when he has levelled his shaft, whether his intended victim be of Athens or Benetia, entered the doctor's retreat at Hampstead one day, and summoned him to leave his books and manuscripts, the cherished acquisition of so many happy years! His collection went the way of most libraries—through the hands of the auctioneer, into the vacant niches or shelves which had long waited for the demise of the owner. The Rev. Mr. Cracherode's long purse swallowed many an "Exemplar Aeshvianum." Dr. Hunter expended £140 upon the spot, and Dr. Maty purchased to a considerable amount for the British Museum. Not more than this! Even Royalty was a competitor in this day's struggle. The King of England was a purchaser of £300 worth of rare tomes, and his Majesty of France, and some other foreign collectors, absorbed, through the agency of De Bure, no less than the value of £1500.

We quote from our copy of the BIBLIOMANIA (richly interleaved with original letters of Dr. Dibdin and Richard Heber—for we ourselves are something of a BIBLIOMANIAC) the prices at which a few of the great guns were disposed of.

Dr. Ashew was a warmly-attached friend of Dr. Richard Mead. (See Mead, Richard.) Of the classical attainments of Ashew, Dr. Parr speaks in high praise.

These remarks apply more particularly to the publication of her Letters to Mr. John Norris concerning The Love of God.

Mrs. Astell was held in great estimation by some of the most distinguished persons of her day. Dr. John Walker calls her "The most ingenious Mrs. Astell;" Henry Dodwell styles her "The admirable gentlewoman, Mrs. Astell." Evelyn acknowledges the satisfaction which he derived from her writings. But as perfection is not for man—nor woman either, it seems—we must confess that Bishop Atterbury in writing to Dr. Smalridge complains in this wise:

"I happened about a fortnight ago to dine with Mrs. Astell. She spoke to me of my sermon, and desired me to print it; and after I had given the proper answer, hinted to me that she should be glad of perusing it: I complied with her, and sent her the sermon next day. Yesterday she returned it with this sheet of remarks, which I cannot forbear communicating to you, because I take 'em to be of an extraordinary nature, considering they came from a woman. Indeed one would not imagine that a woman had written them. There is not an expression that carries the least air of her sex from the beginning to the end of it. She attacks me very home, you see, and artfully enough, under a pretence of taking my part against other divines, who are in Hoadley's Measures of Submission. Had she had as much good breeding as good sense, she would be perfect; but she has not the most decent way of insinuating what she means, but is now and then a little offensive and shocking in her expressions; which I wonder at, because a civil turn of words is what her sex is always mistress of. She, I think, is wanting in it. [No doubt he thought so: and pray, what controversialist, "his soul in arms, and eager for the fray," ever thought a hostile criticism "civil"? But the good Bishop in the midst of his chagrin will still be just; and goes on to say:] But her sensible and rational way of writing makes amends for that defect. If indeed [here the wounded author gets uppermost again] any thing can make amends for it. I dread to engage her; [quite an admission!] so I only write a general civil answer to her, and leave the rest to an oral conference."

It is not a little amusing that Mrs. Astell's Christian Religion as Professed by a Daughter of the Church of England, was attributed to the pen of the prelate who thus winces under her criticism.

Lord Stanhope writes to Bishop Atterbury:

"I am informed this day that you have put out in print a mighty ingenious pamphlet; but that you have been pleased to flatter it upon one Mrs. Astell, a female friend and witty companion of your wife's."

Mrs. Astell was a truly exemplary character, and devoted her talent to the best ends, the interests of true religion, and the improvement of her own sex; indeed, of all capable of appreciating moral excellence and intellectual elevation.

Astell, Mary. See ASTELL.

Astell, Thomas, 1734–1803, an eminent antiquary, and Keeper of the Records in the Tower of London, was descended from the ancient family of the Astles, lords of the Manor of Fauld, in Staffordshire. In 1770 he was appointed by the House of Lords to superintend the printing of the Ancient Records of Parliament: succeeding his father-in-law in this duty, who had been appointed at the instance of Mr. Astle, when consulted on this subject by the House of Lords in 1766. The Records were published in six folio volumes. Of the Society of Antiquaries he was a useful and distinguished member, and contributed several valuable papers to the Archæologia in vols. iv., vii., x., xii., and xiii.; and to the Vetusta Monumenta. To the Catalogue of the Harleian MSS. he wrote a preface and index. In 1777 appeared his Catalogue of the MSS. in the Cottonian Library, with a catalogue of the charters. Mr. Planta's Cat. of MSS. has superseded Astle's, but the latter is still useful as containing the only cat. of the charters in that library.

The Will of King Henry VII., Lon., 1775. The Will of King Alfred, Oxon., 1788. Mr. Astle's great work is, The Origin and Progress of Writing, as well hieroglyphic as elementary; illustrated by engravings taken from Marbles, MSS., and Charters, Ancient and Modern; also some Account of the Origin of Printing, Lon., 1784. A second and improved edition appeared in 1803. To this production the high praise has been awarded of being "the completest work on the subject of Writing in this or any other language." In the last chapter he labours to prove that the art of printing took its origin from the Chinese. Upon this hydra-headed theme we have no space here to enter. We shall have to meet it somewhere, we presume, before we finish our volume. Apropos, we take it very ill of Mr. Brunet that he condescends not to favour Astle's great work with a single bibliographical comment. He can expend a column upon Bodoni, (who deserves honourable mention), but not a line for Astle. He should remember "the swashing blow" of good Master Dibdin, when the hero of Dijon "bit the dust," and Lené and Liequet "fled the field" discomfited. Let M. Brunet (one of the first of living bibliographers) profit by their example, lest he provoke a second Crapelet war! His silence is the more inexcusable after the glowing eulogy of Peignot, who in his Essai sur l'Histoire du Parchemin et du Vêlin calls Astle's book "le plus ample et le plus savant sur l'histoire de la calligraphie."

"The general character that we have to give of Mr. Astle's book is, that the author's reflections are all very ingenious, most of them just, and the engraved specimens properly chosen for the entertainment of curious readers, and for the information of men of business."

But we are far from being satisfied with his speculations on language, and the origin of writing."—Lon. Monthly Review for October, 1784: see this whole article, which has been highly commended. It is in opposition to some of Astle's views.

"This work, it is needless to add, will fully establish Mr. Astle's literary fame, and will transmit his name with lustre to posterity, together with those of his fellow-labourers, Mr. Harris and Lord Monboddo."—Lon. Gent. Mag. for 1784: see Horne's Introduct. to the Study of Bibliography, vol. i. p. 72.

Astle's remarks upon the character and reign of Henry VII. have been highly praised.

"His learning, which is various, cannot escape observation; and his authorities in general are the best that could be found. His judgment, precision, and minuteness, are all to be highly commended. There is even a considerable spirit of philanthropy in his work; and in so far he advances beyond the character of a mere antiquary. He displays not, however, any splendour or brightness of genius. He is simple and judicious, but not original."—New Catalogue of English Living Authors.

We subjoin an interesting letter from Dr. Johnson to our author:—

"July 17, 1781.
"Sir,—I am ashamed that you have been forced to call so often for your books, but it has been by no fault on either side. They have never been out of my hands, nor have I ever been at home without seeing you; for to see a man so skilful in the antiquities of my country is an opportunity of improvement not willingly to be missed."

"Your notes on Alfred appear to me very judicious and accurate, but they are too few. Many things familiar to you are unknown to me and to most others; and you must not think too favourably of your readers: by supposing them knowing, you will leave them ignorant. Measure of land, and value of money, it is of great importance to state with care. Had the Saxons any gold coin?"

"I have much curiosity after the manners and transactions of the Middle Ages, but have wanted either diligence or opportunity, or both. [Then, good Doctor! why attempt to edit Shakspeare?] You, sir, have great opportunities, and I wish you both diligence and success."

I am, sir, &c., "SAM. JOHNSON."

Astley, F. F. Hints to Planters, Lon., 1807.

Astley, John, Master of the Jewel House, and Gentleman of Queen Elizabeth's Privy Chamber, was not only a great equestrian himself, but much concerned to improve the bad riding which he was pained to see around him, when taking the air for his health or amusement. The Art of Riding was especially worthy of cultivation in the reign of a queen so fond of getting up parties of pleasure to the castles of her rich subjects, that the worthy antiquary, John Nichols, had materials enough to make up three quarto volumes of The Progresses of Queen Elizabeth, a work so highly esteemed that copies have been repeatedly sold by public auction for upwards of £40. In such excursions as that to Kenilworth Castle, so glowingly described by Master Laneham, where on the road "after great cheer at dinner, there was pleasant pastime in hunting by the way after," wo to the knight who knew not how to "sit his horse aright." The queen set an example of the use of the saddle to her "loving subjects," for Laneham tells us—"So passing into the inner court, her majesty (that never rides but alone) there set down from her palfrey, was conveyed up to her chamber."

But to return to Master Astley. In 1584, his zeal for good horsemanship induced him to put forth a work entitled

The Art of Riding set forth, in a Breve Treatise, with a due Interpretation of certaine Places, alledged out of Xenophon and Gryson, very expert and excellent Horsemen: wherein also the true Use of the Hand, by the said Gryson's Rules and Precepts, is speciallie touched: and how the Author of this present Worke hath put the same in Practise; also, what Profit men may reape thereby; without the knowledge whereof, all the residue of the Art of Riding is but vaine. Lastle, is added a short Discourse of the Chaine of Causses, The Trench and the Martingale, Lon., 1584, 4to.

In the same year, not unwilling to call in the aid of a foreigner in the reformation of bad riding, he published

The Art of Riding, containing diverse necessarie Instructions, Demonstrations, Helps, and Corrections, appertaining to Horsemanship, not heretofore expressed by anie other Author; written at large in the Italian Tongue, by Maister Claudio Corte, a man most excellent in this Art. Here brieflie reduced into certaine English Discourses to the benefit of Gentlemen desirous of such knowledge, Lon., 1584.

Athelard of Bath, flourished 1110-1120, is the greatest name in English science before Robert Grossetête and Roger Bacon. His name would lead us to believe that he was of Saxon blood. He was born probably in the latter part of the eleventh century, and first quitted England to study in the schools of Tours and Laon. In the latter place he opened a school, and had, among other disciples his nephew, to whom he appears to have been affectionately attached. But Athelard's love of knowledge was unsatisfied with the state of science in France, and he left his school, and crossed the Alps to Salerno, from whence he proceeded to Greece and Asia Minor, and it is very probable that he went to study among the Arabs in the East. Bagdad and Egypt were then the seats of Arabian learning. On his arrival in his native country, after an absence of seven years, the throne, he tells us, was occupied by Henry I.; and one of the first books he published after his arrival, being dedicated to William, Bishop of Syracuse, must have been written before 1116, the date of that prelate's death. The manner in which Athelard speaks of the reception of the Arabian sciences, seems to show that they were then quite new among the Christians of the West, and to contradict the opinion founded on a legend preserved by William of Malmesbury, that they had been introduced long before by Gerbert. We know nothing more of Athelard's personal history. His celebrity was great in after times; and in the thirteenth century Vincent of Beauvais gives him the title of Philosophus Anglorum.

Athelard's writings appear to have enjoyed a great popularity. We may divide them into two classes—original works, and translations from the Arabic. Among the former are, 1. The treatise De eodem et diverso, already mentioned, of which the only copy known to exist is preserved in a manuscript in the Bibliothèque Royale at Paris. It is written in the form of a letter to his nephew, and dedicated to William, Bishop of Syracuse. 2. Tanner mentions a tract with the somewhat similar title of De sic et non sic, which he says commenced with the words Memini et ex quo incepimus. 3. The Questiones Naturales, of which there are many manuscripts existing under a great variety of titles. This treatise was printed apparently as early as the fifteenth century. It is written in the form of a dialogue between Athelard and his nephew, and is dedicated to Richard, Bishop of Bayeux, (1108-1133.) In this tract Athelard gives his opinion on various physical questions concerning animals, man, and the elements. At the conclusion he promises a treatise on higher philosophical subjects, De initio de initiis. 4. Regulae Abaci. This tract, on a subject which since the time of Gerbert had employed the pens of a multitude of mathematicians, was perhaps one of Athelard's earliest writings. It is preserved in a MS. of the library of Leyden, where it is preceded by a short preface containing Athelard's name, and without the preface or name, in a manuscript in the Bibliothèque Royale at Paris. 5. A treatise on the Astrolabe, evidently taken from Arabian writers. A copy is preserved in the British Museum. Leland, who sometimes speaks rather extravagantly of the style of the mediæval writers, calls this "libellum argutum, numerosum, rotundum." It is certainly the one of Athelard's works which least merits that character. 6. Problemata. Leland mentions a work of Athelard's under this title, which he had seen in the library of the Franciscans at London, but which had afterwards disappeared. 7. De septem artibus liberalibus. Tanner, on the authority of Boston of Bury, mentions a work of Athelard's bearing this title, written partly in prose and partly in verse, and commencing with the words Sæpernumero est philosophia. 8. A treatise on the Computus, mentioned by Tanner as having formerly been in the library of the Earl of Stamford. 9. Tanner states that a tract is indicated in the old table of contents of a manuscript in the King's Library, under the title Liber magistri Adelardi Bathoniensis qui dicitur Mappæ clavicula, but the tract itself had been torn out.

The most important of Athelard's translations from the Arabic was: 1. The Elements of Euclid. This became the text-book of all succeeding mathematicians. The manuscripts of Athelard's Euclid are numerous. It was afterwards published with a commentary under the name of Campanus, and printed at Venice as early as 1482. Mr. Halliwell has mentioned some reasons for believing that the commentary also was in reality the work of Athelard. Dr. Dee possessed a manuscript which contained translations of Euclid's Optics and Catoptrics under the name of Athelard. Athelard also translated, 2. The Isagoge minor Jafaris mathematici in Astronomiam. There is a copy of this work in the Bodleian library. 3. Esich Elkauresmi, hoc est, tabulae Chawaresmice ex Arabico tractatæ. A translation of the Kharisimian tables. There is a copy of this also in the Bodleian library. Leland mentions a work translated from the Arabic by Athelard, under the title Erith Elcharetmi, which Bale and Boston of Bury give, more correctly, Esich-Jafarim or Esich-Jafaris: it appears to be a corruption of Zydy Djafar, and was probably only another name for the Kharisimian tables. 4. The Præstigia astronomica Thebedis, which formerly existed in a manuscript of the library of Avranches. Perhaps some other tracts of Athelard exist in manuscripts as yet unexamined, or pass as anonymous treatises. M. Jourdain was inclined to attribute to him a piece entitled Liber imbrim secundum Indos, preserved in the Bibliothèque Royale at Paris.

Atkyns, John Tracy. Reports of Cases argued and determined in the High Court of Chancery in the time of Lord Hardwicke, from 1737 to 1754. 3d ed., revised and corrected with notes and references by F. W. Saunders.

"Lord Hardwicke's decisions at this day, and in our own courts, do undoubtedly carry with them a more commanding weight of authority than those of any other judge; and the best editions of the elder Vesey and Atkyns will continue to fix the attention and study of succeeding ages."

For an extended examination of the imputed merits and demerits of these reports, concerning which there has been such a variety of opinion, see that useful work, Marvin's Legal Bibliography.

Mr. Saunders, the editor of the 3d edition, remarks:

"The editor must take this opportunity, however, of observing that he has frequently experienced his researches in the Register's Books anticipated in the previous labours of Mr. Atkyns."

Atkyns, Richard, 1615?-1677, of Balliol Coll., Oxf., pub. a work on the Original and Growth of Printing in England, collected out of History and the Records of this Kingdom; wherein is also demonstrated, that printing appertaineth to the prerogative royal, and is a flower of the crown of England, Lon., 1664.

The object of this work was to give the right and title of printing to the Crown, and by that means to ascertain the validity of the patents which had been granted by the Crown. Atkyns endeavours to rob Caxton of the credit of having introduced printing into England, which he ascribes to Frederick Corsellis. Atkyns was an interested disputant, being a patentee under the Crown for printing, and at issue with the Stationers' Company on this point. We have no space for a review of Atkyns's argument, or rather assumption; and we regret this the less as Dr. Middleton and others have settled the question in favour of Caxton.

"Atkyns, who, by his manner of writing, seems to have been a bold and vain man, might possibly be the inventor: for he had an interest in imposing upon the world."—Dr. Middleton.

But charity forbids our entertaining this suspicion. Wood gives him a good character:

"He was an ingenious and observing man, and saw the vanity of this world sooner than others, though of elder years, which fitted him the better for another."

He also pub. A Vindication, &c., to which is added his Sighs and Ejaculations, 1669.

Atkyns, Sir Robt., 1621-1709, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer temp. William III., was the son of Sir Edward Atkyns, a baron of the Exchequer. For nearly 200 years there was always one of this family filling a judicial station in the kingdom. He was sent to Balliol Coll. Oxf.; from thence removed to Lincoln's Inn, and "applied himself very closely to the study of the law." He was knighted in 1661, and 1672 sworn a judge of the Court of Common Pleas. In April, 1689, he was appointed by William III. Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and on the 19th Oct. in the same year was made speaker of the House of Lords, from which post he retired in 1692. Two years later he resigned his seat in the Exchequer, and spent the remaining fifteen years of his life in retirement, at his seat at Sapperton, in Gloucestershire. His principal works were An Inquiry into the Power of Dispensing with Penal Laws, Lon., 1689; The Power of Jurisdiction and Privilege of Parliament, and the Antiquity of the House of Commons Assured, Lon., 1689; The True and Ancient Jurisdiction of the House of Peers, Lon., 1699; Enquiry into the Jurisdiction of the Chancery, in Causes of Equity, Lon., 1695. He pub. two pamphlets in defence of Lord Russell's innocence, 1689. When applied to for his advice in the case of Lord William Russell, he freely gave it, and pronounced the following memorable declaration, for which he is entitled to the thanks of all friends of constitutional liberty:

"There is, nor ought to be, no such thing as constructive treason; it defeats the very scope and design of the statute of the 25th of Edward III., which is to make a plain declaration what shall be adjudged treason by the ordinary courts of justice."

Atkyns, Sir Robt., 1647-1711, son of the preceding, is chiefly known by his work entitled The Antient and Present State of Gloucestershire, "a large folio volume, beautifully printed" in 1712, the year after Sir Robert's decease. Dr. Parsons, a former chancellor of the diocese, had been at great pains and trouble to collect the materials for a history of the county, but was prevented by ill health from completing his design. Atkyns had the advantage of his valuable collection.

"It was very expensive to the undertaker, who printed it in a pompous manner, adorning it with variety of views and prospects of the seats of the gentry and nobility, with their arms." "It were to be wished that more authorities had been given and the charters and grants published in the original language."—Gougen.

The transcripts of all these were collected by Parsons. On the night of Jan. 29-30, 1712-13, a fire took place at Mr. Bowyer's printing office, and

"Among the articles which perished by this sudden and awful visitation was by far the greater number of Sir Robert Atkyns' valuable 'History of Gloucestershire'; a few copies only of it having been snatched from the flames, of which they still retain indelible marks."—Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, vol. i.

Mr. Herbert republished this work in 1768. Great part of this second edition was also destroyed by fire. Dr. Ducarel, in the preparation of his Repertory of Endowments of Vicarages, drew for Gloucester principally from Atkyns and the Worcester Register.

Atlay, Jos. Work on Distillery, Lon., 1794.

Atlee, Washington L., M.D., born Feb. 22d, 1808, at Lancaster, Penn.; a distinguished lecturer and medical writer. Prof. Atlee has rendered great service to the cause of medicine in the United States, having contributed upwards of forty valuable papers to the principal Medical Journals in the Union. He is also the author of thirteen pamphlets, addresses, and lectures on Medicine, Chemistry, Botany, &c.

Atmore, C. Chandler's Hist. of the Persecution, 1813. Atterbury, English glee composer, the author of the popular glee, "Come, let us all a Maying go," &c.

Atterbury, Francis, 1662-1732, Bishop of Rochester, was born at Milton Keynes, near Newport-Pagnell, where his father, Dr. Lewis Atterbury, was rector. In 1676 he was admitted a King's scholar at Westminster, under Dr. Busby; in 1680 he was elected a student of Christ Church, Oxford. His proficiency in the classics soon brought him into considerable notice. In 1682 he published a Latin version of Dryden's Absalom and Ahithophel, and two years later edited some Latin poems by Italian authors. In 1690 he married Miss Osborn, a lady celebrated for her beauty—said to be a niece of the Duke of Leeds. He took a considerable part in the famous controversy respecting the authenticity of the Epistles of Phalaris, in which battle Dr. Richard Bentley and the Hon. Charles Boyle were the principal combatants. We know from his own assertion that more than half of Boyle's "Examination" was written by Atterbury: Dr. Smalridge and others bearing a part in this unfortunate production. (See BENTLEY, RICHARD; BOYLE, CHARLES.)

The Sermons of Atterbury attracted great attention from the first, and soon gave rise to controversies which we have merely time to refer to. Hoadley, Burnet, and Wake, were no mean antagonists, but our champion seems never to have been intimidated by numbers or awed by the fear of names. See a list of works on both sides the Convocation Controversy in the Biographia Britannica.

Our author, always willing to lend a hand in a contest, composed for Dr. Sacheverell a great portion of the speech delivered by him at his trial. In 1713 Atterbury was raised to the see of Rochester, with the deanery of Westminster in commendam. It has been thought that the primacy would not have been above his reach, had not the Queen's death, in 1714, interposed an effectual bar to all his prospects of advancement. The present prosperity, and hopes for the future, of Atterbury, and the political party to which he was attached, were buried with Queen Anne. There had been some talk among the ministers of proclaiming the Pretender upon the death of the Queen, and Atterbury is said (upon doubtful authority) to have offered to proclaim the Pretender in his lawn sleeves at Charing Cross, and to have declared—while Bolingbroke and Ormond were protesting—"Never was better cause lost for want of spirit." George I. naturally regarded Atterbury with distrust, and in 1722 there was thought sufficient grounds to authorize his arrest and commitment to the Tower on a charge of high treason. How far this charge was justifiable by the facts will perhaps always remain a matter of uncertainty. On the 16th of May, 1722, he was condemned to the "deprivation of all his offices and benefices, and to suffer perpetual exile." His defence excited great admiration for the boldness and eloquence by which it was distinguished. On going ashore at Calais, he was informed that Lord Bolingbroke—who, after the rising of parliament, had received the king's pardon—was arrived at the same place on his return to England, whereupon he is reputed to have observed, with an air of pleasantry, "Then I am exchanged." Abroad he was active in behalf of the Pretender, which gives good grounds for the belief that he was not hardly dealt with in the sentence of exile. Atterbury died at Paris, Feb. 15th, 1731-2, in the 70th year of his age. His favourite daughter, Mrs. Morice, visited him in Paris, 1729, she being then in a decline, and only survived the voyage twenty-four hours. Pope (who was warmly attached to the bishop) has recorded this affecting incident in the following lines:

SM: "Yes, we have lived,—one pang and then we part!
May Heaven, dear father, now have all thy heart!
Yet, ah! how much we loved, remember still,
Till you are dust like me."

HS: "Dear shade, I will!
Then mix this dust with thine, O spotless ghost!
Oh more than fortune, friends, or country lost!
Is there on earth one care, one wish beside?
Yes! Save my country, Heaven! he said, and died!"

Atterbury's writings were almost entirely of a controversial character. His publications commence with the Absalom and Ahithophel, trans. into Latin verse 1682, and conclude with a belligerent title, in The Voice of the people no voice of God, 1710. The Memoirs of his Life and Conduct, were pub. in 1723. Four volumes of his Sermons in 1740. His Epistolary Correspondence, &c., by J. Nichols, 8vo. 4 vols., in 1783. Private Correspondence in 1768. Miscellaneous Works with Historical Notes, by J. Nichols, 5 vols. Three vols. containing Sermons, Discourses, and Letters, have been since republished, 1789-98.

With Pope, Swift, and many of the principal literary characters of his day, he was on terms of friendship, and was held in great esteem by his associates, as a man of great abilities and a skillful politician. We need hardly say that we cannot consider him as a fitting representative of primitive episcopacy. There have been many brighter illustrations of the true character of a Christian bishop than our bold, declamatory, and mettlesome prelate. Pope thus alludes to his friend when transferred, from the wonted comforts and luxuries of his own halls, to the hospitalities of the house of bondage:

"How pleasing Atterbury's softer hour!
How shined his soul unconquered in the Tower!"

Epilogue to the Sat. Dialogue.
Swift, in an imaginary dialogue between himself and Stella, speaks of a dean to be discovered by Stella's ingenuity:

"A little black man of pretty near fifty." "The same." "A good pleasant man." "Aye, the same." "Cunning enough." "Yes." "One that understands his own interest." "As well as any body." "A very good face, and abundance of wit." "I mean Dr. Atterbury, Dean of Carlisle." See Roe's Biog. Dic.; Cunningham's Biog. History of England.

"His person, it is to be confessed, is no small recommendation, but he is to be highly commended for not losing that advantage, and adding propriety of speech—which might pass the criticism of Longinus—an action which would have been approved by Demosthenes. He never attempts your passions till he has convinced your reason."—A writer in the Tuller.

Smalridge styles him
"Vir in nullo literarum genere hospes, in plerisque artibus et studiis duo et sexagesimo exercitatus, in maxime perfectis literarum disciplinis perfectissimus."

"Atterbury was, on the whole, rather a man of ability than a genius. He writes more with elegance and correctness, than with force of thinking or reasoning. His letters to Pope are too much crowded with very trite quotations from the classics."—WARTON.

Dr. Warburton had a mean opinion of his critical abilities, and of his Discourse on the Iapis of Virgil.

"A very learned correspondence took place between Bishops Potter and Atterbury respecting the times in which the Four Gospels were written; which is preserved in the Epistolary Correspondence of Atterbury."—Nichols's Literary Anecdotes.

"His controversial writings are brilliant, but shallow; his criticisms evince more taste and fancy than erudition; and his translations from Horace, have, as it is now generally admitted, obtained greater praise than they merit. His sermons, however, it must be confessed, are clear, forcible, and, though never sublime, occasionally eloquent and pathetic; and his letters, on which his fame as a writer, must principally depend, are superior even to those of Pope."—Georgiana Mrs.

"Atterbury was nothing more nor less than a Jacobite priest: his writings were extolled by that faction; but his letter on Clarendon's History is truly excellent."—HORACE WALPOLE.

"Sir John Pringle had expressed a wish that I would ask Dr. Johnson's opinion what were the best English sermons for style. I took an opportunity to-day of mentioning several to him. 'Atterbury?' JOHNSON: 'Yes, sir, one of the best.'"—Roswell's Johnson.

With reference to the mention of Atterbury's letters, read his very affecting epistle to Pope, when the bishop was about embarking for a foreign shore; an exile, in adversity and disgrace! His influence over Pope must have been great, as the following instances prove:

"I had flung all my learning into the Dædalion in my Epic Poem, as indeed Milton has done too much in his Paradise Lost. The Bishop of Rochester advised me to burn it: I saw his advice was well grounded, and followed it, though not without some regret. Again: I wrote four books towards it, [Alexander, Prince of Rhodes,] of about a thousand verses each; and had the copy by me till I burnt it, by the advice of the Bishop of Rochester, a little before he went abroad." See Spence's Anecdotes.

"He is the glory of our English orators. In his writings we see language in its strictest purity and beauty. There is nothing dark, nothing redundant, nothing obscure, nothing misplaced."—Dr. DODDRIEDGE.

Bickersteth commends The Rights and Powers and Privileges of an English Convocation, as "written with vigour and perspicuity," but considers Archbishop Wake's answer as "a full reply;" of his sermons he remarks, "A low tone of divinity, in a polished style of writing."

"He was a polite writer. His Sermons probably owed most of their fame, among his contemporaries, who have lavishly applauded him, to his mode of delivery in the pulpit, for the Tatler says it was such as would have been approved by Longinus and Demosthenes."—Dr. KNOX.

"In Sherlock and Atterbury are apparent the highest powers of the mind, and the most unaffected eloquence."—Quarterly Review.

"Atterbury excels in purity of language, delicacy of thought, and graceful allusions."—Dr. E. WILLIAMS.

Atwood, Wm., published a number of Historical and Antiquarian Treatises, Lon., 1680–1705. The best known of his works is The Superiority and Direct Dominion of the Crown of England over the Crown and Kingdom of Scotland, asserted against Sir Thomas Craig, in which he endeavoured to prove that the Kings of Scotland had done homage and paid fealty for their kingdom to the Kings of England as lords paramount; so distasteful was this doctrine to the parliament of Scotland, that they ordered the offensive production in which it was contained to be burned by the common hangman, whilst Dr. Anderson, for his answer to this alleged libel, under the title of An Historical Essay, showing that the Crown and Kingdom of Scotland is Imperial and Independent, received a vote of thanks from the same august body. See ANDERSON, JAMES. Atwood was Chief-Justice of New York, but died in 1702.

Aubrey, John, 1627–1697, an eminent antiquary and naturalist, was entered a gentleman-commoner of Trinity Coll., Oxf., in 1642. His "Miscellanies" is a very curious collection of remarks upon a variety of supernatural subjects, such as Transportation in the Air, Day Fatality, Local Fatality, Blows Invisible, Knockings, Impulses, Converse with Angels and Spirits, &c.; pub. in 1696, and often reprinted. He left a number of works in MS. His Perambulation of the County of Surrey, with additions of Dr. Rawlinson, 5 vols., was pub. 1719–25. In 1813, appeared Letters written by eminent Persons in 17th and 18th Centuries, with Lives of Eminent Men, by John Aubrey, 3 vols. Aubrey's Collection for Wilts was published in 1821. Anthony Wood, who has drawn considerably in his Athen. Oxon. from Aubrey's biographical MSS., speaks highly of him in the second volume of his Fasti, and in his History of the University of Oxford; but after his quarrel with him, he gives him the character of "A shiftless person, roving and maggot-headed, and sometimes little better than crazed. And being exceedingly credulous, would stuff his many letters sent to A. W. with foleries and misinformations, which sometimes would guide him into the paths of error."

Mr. Toland remarks of our author—

"Though he was extremely superstitious, or seemed to be so, yet he was a very honest man, and most accurate in his account of matters of fact. But the facts he knew, not the reflections he made, were what I wanted."

"Whatever Wood, in a peevish humour, may have thought or said of Mr. Aubrey, by whose labours he highly profited, or however Antiquarial Aubrey may have been on the subject of chemistry or ghosts, his character for veracity has never been impeached; and as a very diligent antiquary, his testimony is worthy of attention."—MALONE.

It is worthy of observation that Wood's account of Milton was literally transcribed from Aubrey's MS., who was intimately acquainted with the great poet. Gifford despatches Aubrey in his usual Jeffrey style:

"Whoever expects a rational account of any fact, however trite, from Aubrey, will meet with disappointment. . . . Aubrey thought little, believed much, and confused every thing."—Life of Ben. Jonson.

But Mr. Gifford is not infallible. Sir Richard Colt

Honre, whatever he "expected," was not "disappointed," in finding much valuable matter in Aubrey's MSS.; witness Sir Richard's excellent work on the Antiquities of Wiltshire.

Dr Symonds has thought proper to take our author severely to task after this fashion:

"What credit can be due to this Mr. Aubrey, who picked up information on the highway, and emitted it everywhere as authentic? and who, making our young Shakespeare a butcher's boy, could embrace his hands in the blood of calves, and represent him as smulging in poetry over the convulsions of the dying animals?"

Now we cannot see that the gravamen of this indictment, when sifted a little, amounts to any thing very formidable. "Information on the highway" may be unexceptionably authentic, the Royal Pealman deprecates the publicity of the "struts of Aakalon," and we are assured on the best authority that "Wisdom creeth without, and uttereth her voice in the streets" the juvenile Wolsey, who certainly was possessed of no ordinary genius, doubtless had often "embroidered his hands in the blood of calves," and Shakespeare senior was probably much better pleased with his son's rustic poetry over the evidences of his industry in aiding his father's labours, than he would have been with his writing poetry, and leaving his parent to do all the work himself. As to the triumphal song, which so excites the doctor's ire, we submit that the accusation is not established by the record: Aubrey says that "when he killed a mife, he would do it in a legit style, and make a speech." Now what is there in this that proves the charge of exultation? What is there that forbids the supposition of an epitaph, rather than a psalm? And an epitaph we contend it was, and challenge Dr Symonds and the whole Society of Antiquaries at his back, to disprove our allegation. Moreover, does not Master Aubrey tell us that our great bard was not only "a handsome, well-shaped man," but also "a very good company, and of a very ready and pleasant and smooth wit?" But to be serious, we might add graver faults with Dr Symonds's Life of Shakespeare than he can with "Master Aubrey's" "information." We do not pretend to insist upon the infallibility of Aubrey, but it struck us as barely possible that living as he did with the contemporaries of Shakespeare, he might happen to know as much of his history as Dr Symonds, and others, who favoured the world with their narrative some two centuries later.

Aubrey, M. Oswald Dux Poetice, &c., Oxon. 1708. A post. tract. entitled, The Banities of Oxford, by W. Wills.

Aubrey, or Aubrey, William, 1578-1593, was elected Fellow of All Souls Coll., Ox., in 1547, and Regius Professor of Civil Law, in 1553. His writings remain in manuscript, with the exception of some letters pub. in Strype's Life of Orindal.

"A person he was of exquisite learning and singular profusion, and therefore esteemed with honour by Thomas and others. He wrote several letters to his cousin, Dr. John Dee, concerning the sovereignty of the same, some of which I have seen."—Wood.

He also wrote something respecting the reformation of the Court of Arches, in 1578. One of his descendants remarks,

"He expressed all the wit of the family, so that none descended from him can pretend to any."

Auchincloss, J., D. Audubon, John James, 1780-1851, an eminent American Ornithologist, was the son of an admiral in the French navy, who settled on a plantation in Louisiana. After some attention to commercial pursuits, Mr Audubon concluded to follow the bent of his native taste, and devote his time to ornithological investigations. He travelled for a long time, collecting materials of the most valuable character, which he was afterwards persuaded to give to the world. Accordingly in 1826, he visited Europe, to procure subscribers for his "Birds of America." His reception was most gratifying. Cuvier, Henschel, and Humboldt, Brewster, Wilson, Jeffery, and Sir Walter Scott, evinced a lively interest in his success. His great work was completed in 37 parts, (1828, etc.) elephant folio, containing 448 plates of birds of the natural size, beautifully coloured, published at $182 1/2s. ($1000.) This work embraced 3 vols. fol. of engravings, and 5 vols. 8vo of letter-press, the latter of which constitutes the American Ornithological Biography. At the time of handing his first drawings to the engraver, he had no subscribers, and his friends endeavoured to dissuade him from what they deemed a rash enterprise. But he was not to be deterred: "My heart was moved, and my reliance upon that Power to whom all must depend brought bright anticipations of success." On the completion of this great undertaking, he writes,

"Once more surrounded by all the members of my dear family, enjoying the countenance of numerous friends who have now deserted me, and possessing a competent share of all that can render life agreeable, I look up with gratitude to the Supreme Being and say that I am happy." See Oriswald's From Writers of Am.

New ed. of the Birds of America, 7 vols. imp. 8vo, 1844, 500 plates, being a reduced ed. of the larger work.

Quadrupeds of North America, 3 vols. double medium folio, 150 plates, and 5 vols. 8vo, letter-press. The drawings were made by Mr. Audubon and his son Victor Gifford and John Woodhouse. Same work reduced, 3 vols. 8vo, 156 plates, 1853 the letter-press was prepared principally by Mr. A.'s friend, Rev. Dr. Bachman, of S. Carolina.

"When the celebrated Buffon had completed the ornithological portion of his great work on natural history he announced with unhesitating assurance, that he had 'finished the history of the birds of the world.' Twenty centuries had served for the discovery of only eight hundred species, but this number seemed immense, and the short-sighted naturalist declared that the list would admit of 'no material augmentation,' which embraced hardly a sixteenth of those now known to exist. To this astonishing advance of the science of ornithology, no one has contributed more than Audubon, by his magnificent painting and fascinating history. He has indisputable claims to a respectable rank as a man of letters. Some of his written pictures of birds, or graceful, clearly defined, and brilliantly coloured, are scarcely inferior to the productions of his pencil. His powers of general description are also remarkable."—Illustrator.

"There are works with which critics have not much to do; or with respect to which, they can only discharge that part of their duty which is generally thought to give the most pleasure—we mean praise. No one can see these splendid drawings, and compare them with the ordinary illustrations of natural history, in which animals appear as specimens as if they had been sitting for their portraits, without admiring his taste and skill. If Mr. Audubon had contented himself with Linnaean descriptions, he would have had the honour of discovering more birds than readers."—N. American Review.

"The hosts of all varied towards Audubon who were capable of conceiving the difficulties, dangers, and exertions, that must be endured, and overcome, before gentlemen, the glory of his innumerable tribe, in fact, what you would expect from enthusiasm, and intelligence, most in measure, a perfect gentleman, and him for the simplicity and frankness of his own walk that over it, the most splendid monuments which art mythology."—Cuvier.

Autes, Jane, 1773-1817, was a native of Stevenston, in Hampshire, of which place her father was rector for 46 years. Her novels are held in high estimation. She wrote Scene and Sensibility, Pride and Prejudice, Mansfield Park, Emma, Northanger Abbey, and Persuasion:

the last two were posthumous; the first four were pub. anonymously.

"Ferrier and Austen have given portraits of real society far superior to any thing vain man has produced of the like nature. . . I read again, and, for the third time, Miss Austen's very finely written novel of Pride and Prejudice. That young lady had a talent for describing the involvements, feelings, and characters of ordinary life, which is to me the most wonderful I have ever met with. The big bow-wow I can do myself like any one going; but the exquisite touch, which renders common-place things and characters interesting from the truth of the description, and the sentiment, is denied to me. What a pity so gifted a creature died so early!"—Sir Walter Scott's Diary.

"Her works may be safely recommended, not only as among the most unexceptionable of their class, but as combining, in an eminent degree, instruction with amusement, though without the direct effort at the former, of which we have complained as sometimes defeating its object. For those who cannot or will not learn any thing from productions of this kind, she has provided entertainment which entitles her to thanks; for more innocent amusement is in itself a good, when it interferes with no greater, especially as it may occupy the place of some other that may not be innocent. The Eastern monarch, who proclaimed a reward to him who should discover a new pleasure, would have deserved well of mankind had he stipulated that it should be blameless. Those, again, who delight in the study of human nature, may improve in the knowledge of it, and in the profitable application of that knowledge, by the perusal of such fictions as those before us."—ARCHBISHOP WHATELY: Quarterly Review, 1821.

Austin, Samuel, the younger, 1636-1665? son of the preceding, entered Wadham Coll., Oxf., in 1652. Wood deals him no gentle blow in his account of his father, where he says,

"He had a son of both his names, (a conceited coxcomb,) who endeavoured to Pubesce, but through his exceeding vanity and folly he was made use of, as another Theo. Coryate, by certain poets of Oxon. in their respective copies of verses set before his Naps on Parnassus, &c., printed 1668, as I shall tell you in my other Volume of Writers."

Anthony keeps his promise, and when he reaches our unfortunate poet, he again administers unsparing castigation:

"Such was the vanity of this person, that he, being extremely conceited of his own worth, and over-valuing his poetical fancy, more than that of Cleveland, who was then accounted by the Revivados the Hectoring Prince of Poets, fell into the hands of the satirical wits of this university, who, having easily got some of his prose and poetry, served him as the wits did Theo. Coryate in his time, and published them under these titles, Naps upon Parnassus. A Sleepy Muse Wipt and Pincht, though not Awakened, &c., Lon., 1668, Oct. Characters—printed with the former. Both which were ushered into the world by more than twenty copies of verses (advantaging the sale of the book) by such that had the name of, or at least pretended to be, poets."

Wood states that it was the common report that Robt. Aylett was the author of Britannia Antiqua Illustrata, published under the name of his nephew, Aylett Sammes. When speaking of this unlucky gentlemen, old Anthony "remembers his swashing blow," and disposes of him in the following trenchant style:

"The common report then was, that not he, but his quondam Uncle, was the author; and to confirm it, was his great ignorance in Matters and Books of Antiquity. I was several times in his company when he spent some weeks this Year in Oxon., and found him to be an impertinent, grinning, [grinning,] and pedantic coxcomb; and so ignorant of Authors, that he never heard, before I mentioned it to him, of the great Antiquary, John Leland, or of his printed or manuscript Works, nor any thing of Balcan; nor could he give any account of Authors that are quoted in the said Britannia Antiqua Illustrata, &c."

Ayliffe, John, LL.D., a Fellow of New College in Oxford, pub. The Ancient and Present State of the University of Oxford, (Lon., 1714,) compiled chiefly from Wood's History of Oxford. The work gave so much offence from alleged aspersions and misrepresentations, that an order was decreed consigning it to the hands of the hangman to be burnt, and Ayliffe was degraded, and expelled the University. In 1716 he pub. an account of this matter in this "Case." He also gave to the world, 1. Parergon Juris Canonici Anglicani, 1726; 2. The Law of Pawns, Lon., 1732; 3. A New Pandect of the Roman Civil Law, 1734. "Ayliffe's work, though learned, is dull and tedious, and stuffed with superfluous matter, delivered in a most confused manner."—Preface to Brown's Civ. Law.

Aylmer, G. J. Introduct. to Prac. Arithmetic, Lon., 1812.

Aylmer, or Elmer, John, 1521–1594, an eminent English prelate, was at one time chaplain to the Marquis of Dorset, afterwards Duke of Suffolk, and tutor to his daughter, Lady Jane Grey. See ASCHAM, ROGER. In the convocation held in the first year of Queen Mary, he was one of the six learned men who offered to dispute all the controverted points in religion against the most learned champions of the Papists. Obligated to leave his country, he found a quiet retreat at Zurich. Whilst abroad, he answered a treatise pub. by John Knox, at Geneva, in 1558, against the government of women. The title of this answer is sufficiently curious to be extracted:

"An Harborowe for faithfull and trewe subiectes, against the late blowne Blast concerning the Governmt of Women; wherein be confuted all such reasons as a stranger of late made in that behalf. With a Brief Exhortation to Obedience. Strasb., 1559, 4to."

Upon the accession of Elizabeth, he returned, and in 1562 was made Archdeacon of Lincoln, and in 1576 was promoted to the bishopric of London, upon the translation of Bishop Sandys to York.

"He was well learned in the languages, was a ready disputant, and a deep divine."—Athen. Oxon.

Wood tells us of an instance of his tact in exciting the attention of an inattentive auditory, which device, or something equally efficacious, we commend to some preachers of our own day.

"When his Auditory grew dull and inattentive he would, with some pretty and unexpected conceit, move them to attention. Among the rest was this: He read a long Text in Hebrew, whereupon all seemed to listen what would come after such strange Words, as if they had taken it for some conjuration: then he shewed their folly, that when he spake English, whereby they might be instructed and edified, they neglected, and hearkened not to it; and now to read Hebrew, which they understood no word of, they seem'd careful and attentive."

Ayliffe, Sir Joseph, 1709–1781, a distinguished antiquary, was entered at St. John's College, Ox. in 1724. He completed a Calendar of the Ancient Charters, and of the Scotch and Welsh Rolls in the Tower of London, (pub. Lon., 1780,) commenced by the Rev. Philip Morant. He contributed some papers to the Archæologia, (see vol. iii., pp. 185, 239, 376,) and aided in editing second editions of Hearne's Leland's Collectanea, his Liber Niger, and his Curious Discourses. Mr. Thorp had the benefit of his services in the publication of the Registrum Roffense, in 1769. He also contributed to the publication of the Society of Antiquaries, and to the Vetusta Monumenta. Mr. Gough, referring to his own Sepulchral Monuments of Great Britain, thus deplores the loss of our author, to whom he applies a title which few men better deserved than Mr. Gough himself:

"The Society of Antiquaries have published engravings of Five Monuments in Westminster Abbey, with an accurate description by the Montague of England, the late Sir Joseph Ayliffe. When I reflect on his intimate acquaintance with every part of that valuable structure, and the opportunities he had for pursuing his inquiries there, I am at a loss whether to lament his reluctance to continue what he had so happily begun, or my own presumption in attempting to supply his knowledge by vain conjectures. He closed a life devoted to the study of our National Antiquities before three sheets of this work had passed the press; and it can only pay a tribute to his abilities."—Nichols's Literary Anecdotes.

"His extensive knowledge of our national antiquities and municipal rights, and the agreeable manner in which he communicated it to his friends and the public, made him sincerely regretted by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance."

Mr. Ayscough, Dr. Maty, and Mr. Harper each contributed a third of the labour in the preparation of Catalogues Librorum Impressorum, qui in Museo Britannico ad serviantur, 2 vols. folio, 1787.

In 1790, Mr. Stockdale pub. a new edition of the works of Shakspeare, with a "Copious Index to the remarkable Passages and Words," by Mr. Ayscough. The first octavo edition of the great bard in one volume was put forth by Mr. Stockdale in 1784. Some objected to the bulk of the volume, and in the above edition a second title-page was printed for the convenience of those who chose to bind the work in two volumes.

"But the most valuable circumstance attending this edition is the extensive index to Shakspeare, which occupies nearly 700 pages. . . . Indices, useful in general, are still more so in the case of such authors as Shakspeare, whose language has in many places become obsolete and obscure from time. . . . An index, like the present, will often be found to throw more light on a difficult passage of our celebrated bard, than all his commentators put together."—Lon. Monthly Review.

We need hardly say that Mr. Ayscough's index, and all other works of a similar character, have been entirely superseded by the invaluable Concordance to Shakspeare of Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke. (See her name.) Mr. Ayscough also compiled indexes for the Monthly Review, The British Critic, the first 56 yearly volumes of the Gentleman's Magazine, &c.

"His labours in literature were of the most useful cast, and manifested a patience and assiduity seldom to be met with; and his laborious exertions in the vast and invaluable library of the British Museum, form a striking instance of his zeal and indefatigable attention. He soon acquired that slight degree of knowledge in several languages, and that technical knowledge of old books and of their authors, and particularly that skill in deciphering difficult writing, which amply answered the most useful purposes of the librarian as well as the visiting scholar."—CHALMERS.

Mr. Ayscough died at his apartments in the British Museum, Oct. 30, 1804. We avail ourselves of this opportunity to recommend most earnestly to all authors and publishers the adoption, in all cases where books are of any permanent value, of a copious index. Which of our readers of a literary turn has not, perhaps a dozen times in a day, replaced a book on its shelf, in disappointment and disgust, knowing that some passage was there to which he wished to refer, but which, after an exhaustion of time and patience, he was unable to find from the want of a good index? It is well remarked by the Lon. Monthly Review:

"The compilation of an index is one of those useful labours for which the public, commonly better pleased with entertainment than with real service, are rarely so forward to express their gratitude as we think they ought to be. It has been considered as a task fit only for the plodding and the dull: but with more truth, it may be said that this is the judgment of the idle and the shallow. The value of any thing, it has been observed, is best known by the want of it. Agreeably to this idea, we, who have often experienced great inconveniences from the want of indices, entertain the highest sense of their worth and importance. We know that, in the construction of a good index, there is far more scope for the exercise of judgment and abilities, than is commonly supposed. We feel the merits of the compiler of such an index, and we are ever ready to testify our thankfulness for his exertions."

Authors and editors are often deterred from making an index by the fear of labour; but this is no excuse; if the book be worth publishing, it is worth an index, and the labour can be much reduced by system.

"A youth of 18 has transcribed the whole of Xenophon's Cyri Expedition, in order to an Index; and has entered upon Thucydides for the same purpose. Another young man here has attacked Harduin's folio edition of Themiastius; and the senior youths of Magdalen School in Oxford are jointly composing an Index to the first volume of Dr. Battle's Isocrates. . . . Give me leave to observe to you that experience has shown us a way of saving much time (perhaps more than half of the whole time required) in transcribing an Author for an Index, by first transcribing all the words of a page, and then getting down the number of the page and line after each word of the page, instead of adding the number immediately as each word is written." (The learned Mr. Merrick in a letter to Dr. Wharton.)—Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, vol. iv.

The following remarks abundantly support our position: "Those authors, whose subjects require them to be voluminous, will do well, if they would be remembered as long as possible, not to omit a duty which authors in general, but especially modern authors, are too apt to neglect—that of appending to their works a good index. For their deplorable deficiencies in this respect, Professor De Morgan, speaking of historians, assigns the curious reason, 'that they think to oblige their readers to go through them from beginning to end, by making this the only way of coming at the contents of their volumes. They are much mistaken; and they might learn from their own mode of dealing with the writings of others, how their own will be used in turn.' We think that the unwise indolence of authors has probably had much more to do with the matter than the reason thus humorously assigned; but the fact which he proceeds to mention is incontestably true. 'NO WRITER (of this class) IS SO MUCH READ AS THE ONE WHO MAKES A GOOD INDEX.—OR SO MUCH CITED.'"—HENRY ROGERS: The Vanity and Glory of Literature.

Among modern works which might be mentioned as presenting copious indexes are Ball's edition of Robertson's Works, Lon., 1840; Westley and Davis's edition of Gibbon's Decline and Fall, Lon., 1837; some of the publications of that enterprising bibliophile, H. G. Bohn, and many other works that might be cited. But of all full indexes within our knowledge, commend us to that appended to Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, where to eight volumes of text we have more than fourteen hundred columns of index! This scale is, of course, too vast for general imitation, but it teaches a lesson to those who content themselves with giving a few lines of index to a vast body of text! But the greatest example of zeal in this line on record—the first index-maker in the world—is the British House of Commons! In 1778 there were paid for compiling indexes to the Journals of the House of Commons, the following sums: To Mr. Edward Moore, £8,400 as a final compensation for thirteen years' labour; Rev. Mr. Forster, £3,000 for nine years' ditto; Rev. Dr. Roger Flaxman, £3,000 for nine years' ditto; and to Mr. Cunningham, £500 in part for ditto; making a total of £12,900! Nor is this the end thereof. For we may say with Nestor—in another sense—

"In such indexes, although small
To their subsequent volumes, there is seen
The baby figure of the giant mass
Of things to come, at large."—Troilus and Cressida.

To quote the same author, give us a good "index," and we will almost excuse an "obscure prologue." Of course, like all good things, indexes may be abused; the pretender will make them the end of his journey, whilst the true student they will be merely the sign-posts of the road; such charlatans they were, who two centuries since excited the ire of Joseph Glanville, and caused him to exclaim:

"Methinks 'tis a pitiful piece of knowledge, that can be learnt from an index; and a poor ambition to be rich in the inventory of another's treasure."—The Vanity of Dogmatizing.

Pope, too, tells us

"How index-learning turns no student pale,
Yet holds the eel of science by the tail."—Dunciad, B. 2.

But we doubt if much harm was ever done in this way. The very ambition thus censured may lead to real acquisition, and often has. Watts appreciated a good index so highly, that he tells his reader,

"If a book has no index or good table of contents, 'tis very useful to make one as you are reading it."

We may conclude this rather prolix (we hope it may prove to be a useful) article, by citing the authority of a man of letters, who was never excelled for a practical common-sense view of subjects which engaged his attention.

Dr. Johnson to Richardson respecting a new edition of Clarissa:

"I wish you would add an index rerum, that when the reader recollects any incident, he may easily find it, which at present he cannot do, unless he knows in which volume it is told; for Clarissa is not a performance to be read with eagerness, and laid aside forever; but will be occasionally consulted by the busy, the aged, and the studious; and therefore I beg that this edition, by which I suppose posterity is to abide, may want nothing that can facilitate its use. I am, sir, yours, &c., SAM. JOHNSON."

It was excellently said by the learned Michael Mattaire

—a Corypheus of index-makers himself:

"Non est acutissimū, fātor, ingenū, non altissimæ eruditōis, Indices contētere. Majorem tamen nō molestiam editorū, nō lectori utilitatem afferit; cumque rei cūjusslibet necessitas ex ipsius utilitate oriat̃ur, et in eadem consistat; quidnā affirmem nihil fore esse magis necessarium? Non itaque sum sollicitus, quantū illo esse ingenio, quam parum eruditōne videar valere, dum literatorum commodis quomodocunque inserviam. In construendis rēbus, operarius bajulusque, non minus architecto prodest."—Mattaire's Epist. ad D. P. Des Maisseaux; cited at large in vol. iv. pp. 661-665 of Nichols's Literary Anecdotes.

That true worthy, Fuller—Thomas the quaint—gives his testimony on the same side:

"An Index is a necessary implement and no impediment of a book, except in the same sense wherein the Carriages of an Army are termed Impediments. Without this, a large Author is but a labyrinth, without a clue to direct the Reader therein. I confess, there is a lazy kind of Learning which is only indexical; when Scholars (like Adders which only bite the Horse-beels) nibble but at the Tables, which are calces Librorum, neglecting the body of the Book. But, though the idle deserve no crutches, (let not a staff be used by them, but on them,) pity it is the weary should be denied the benefit thereof, and industrious Scholars prohibited the accommodation of an Index, most used by those who most pretend to contemn it."—Worthies.

The index to Nicholas Antonio's Bibliotheca of Spanish Writers has received great commendation:

"I have quoted Mr. Baillet, who shows the value of it particularly. He had good reason for recommending even the Indexes, for they are very well formed and useful. The Author has added a short preface to them, which shows his excellent taste and judgment; he has quoted there the thought of a Spanish writer, Indices Libri ab Antore, Librum ipsum a quovis alio conficiendum esse. 'An Author ought to make the Index to his book, whereas the book itself may be written by any person else.' The contrary method is generally taken; Authors refer to others the pains of making alphabetical Indexes; and it must be owned, that those Gentlemen who are not patient of labour, and whose talent consists only in the fire and vivacity of imagination, had much better let others make the Index to their works; but a man of judgment and application will succeed incomparably better in composing the Tables to his own writings, than a stranger can. There might be a variety of good directions given for the composition of these Tables, which may be justly called the soul of books."—BAILLE.

When Baillet lauded Antonio's Index, he was like an epicure, who commends the dish which tickles his own palate. Baillet was such an admirer of a good plump Index, that when Hermant had him snugly installed as Librarian to M. De Lamignon, the uncouth helluo librorum sets to work to make an Index, and an Index Rerum at that!

"Though troubled with a great pain in his legs, which sometimes grew very violent, and notwithstanding the many visits he received, which continually interrupted his labours, he applied himself with so much diligence to the drawing up of an Index of all the subjects treated of in the books in M. De Lamignon's library, that he finished it in August, 1682, [about two years' labour.] That Index grew to such a length, by the additions he continued to make to it, that it contains thirty-five volumes in folio, all written by M. Baillet himself. When he had finished that laborious, but useful, work, he wrote a Latin preface to it, which he published. We find there an account of the manner in which he drew up that Index. He promised in the same place to write an Index, or Catalogue, of all the authors, whose books were in M. De Lamignon's library."

Gruter's great work on Inscriptions—Inscriptiones antiquæ totius orbis romani in absolutissimum corpus reductæ, (1st edit., Heidelberg, 1602)—was not only greatly aided by Scaliger, but so anxious was this eminent scholar that the work should be complete, that he devoted ten months to writing an index of 24 classes.

"If it appears surprising that so great a man should undertake so laborious a task, and which seemed so much below him, we ought to consider that such Indexes cannot be made but by a very able man. To succeed in that task, it is necessary to understand perfectly the inscriptions, and know how to distinguish what is peculiar from what is common; and sometimes to illustrate them by some remarks, and explain the sense, not only of words, of which there remain but one or two syllables, but even of single letters."—L. CLERC: Biblioth. Choisie.

After finishing his Index, Scaliger wrote the following epigram:

"Si quem dura manet sententia Judicis, olim
Dannatum ærumalis supplicique caput;
Hunc neque fibrill læssent Ergastula mæna,
Nec rigidas vexent fœna metalla manus.
Lexica contextat: nam cætera quid moror? omnes
Pœnarum facies his labor unus habet."

Le Clerc truly hints that it is not every man that can write, who is capable of making an Index: we have an amusing instance of the evils resulting from carelessness in this matter, in the case of "The writer who drew up the Index to Delechamp's Athenæus, who says that Euripides lost in one day, his wife, two sons, and a daughter, and refers us to page 60, where nothing like this is found: but we find in page 61, that Euripides going to Icaria, wrote an epigram on a disaster that happened at a peasant's house, where a woman, with her two sons and a daughter, died by eating of mushrooms. Judge, from this instance, what hazards those run who rely on Index-makers."—BAYLE.

This only proves that we must have good Index-makers, not that we must do without such aids.

Ayton, or Aytoun, Sir Robert, 1570-1638, a native of Fifeshire, in Scotland, was the author of poetical pieces in several languages, viz.: Greek, Latin, French, and English. Among his productions are the following: 1. Ad Jacobum VI. Britanniarum Regem, Angliam petentem, Panegyris, p. 40 inter Delitias Poetarum Scotorum, edit. ab Arturo Jonstono, Amst., 1637, 8vo. 2. Basia, sive strena ad Jacobum Hayum, equitem illustrissimum, p. 54. 3. Lessus in Funere Raphaelis Thorei, Medici, et Poetæ præstantissimi, Londini peste extincti, p. 61, ibid. 4. Carina Caro, p. 63, ib. 5. De Proditione Pulveres, quæ incidit in diem Martis, p. 65, ib. 6. Gratiarum Actio, cum in privatum Cubiculum admitteretur, p. 66, ibid. 7. Epigrammata Varia, ib. 8. In Obitum Ducis Buckinghamii, a Filtono cultro extincti, M.D.C.XXVIII. p. 74, ibid.

Sir Robert was educated at St. Andrews. He was employed both at home and abroad in the service of James I. and Charles I. He was knighted by King James, and appointed by him one of the gentlemen of his bed-chamber, and private secretary to his queen. Ben Jonson declared to Drummond that Sir Robert had an affection for him, (Jonson.) Some of his English pieces, which have been highly commended for their style, were published in Watson's Collection of Scottish Poems, (1706-11.) Aubrey remarks that Mr. John Dryden has seen verses of his, some of the best of that age, printed with some other verses. "Aubrey further states that he was acquainted with all the wits of his time in England." He died at London, March, 1638, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, under a handsome monument of black marble.

Aytoun, William Edmondstone, b. 1813, is a member of the Edinburgh bar. He succeeded Mr. Moir as Professor of Literature and Belles Lettres in the University of Edinburgh, where his lectures, distinguished by great ability and correct literary taste, are in high estimation. He is now editor of that sterling periodical, Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine, to which he has long been a valued contributor. Nom de plume Augustus Dunshunner.

Mr. Aytoun married a daughter of the gentleman who for so many years delighted the literary world as conductor of Blackwood—Christopher North, alias Professor Wilson.

"At the time of the railway mania he flung off a series of papers, the first entitled 'How we got up the Glen Mutchkin Railway,' descriptive of the doings in the Chapel Court of Edinburgh and Glasgow; papers which for broad, vigorous humour, and felicitous settings forth of genuine Scotch character, are almost unrivalled."—Men of the Time.

Mr. Aytoun wrote many pieces in the Book of Ballads, edited by Bon Gaultier, a nom de plume, under which he and Mr. Theodore Martin have contributed to a number of periodicals. 1. Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers, and other Poems, Lon. and Edin., 1849. The popularity of this work is evinced by its having reached its 10th ed. in 1857. It has been printed in America.

"Professor Aytoun has appreciated the wealth of his country's history in themes for the historical ballad. . . . In the volume now before us, he puts forth a sustained power, which, in our estimation, places him in the foremost rank of the poets of his time. His lays combine the best qualities of Macaulay and of William Miller. They have all the historic truth and picturesque force of the former, with all the poetic fire and stately march of the latter. We feel, in reading these lays, that we are dealing, not with shadows, but with living men. We are swept back into the stirring times of old, when brave hearts and high souls declared themselves in brave deeds;—when honour, self-denial, devotion, were living things;—when patriotism and loyalty were active principles, and the worship of mammon had not shrivelled up the sons of men into self-seeking and sordid pride. We thank the poet who elevated our soul by a noble thought—by a delineation of some generous and lofty nature, woven from the visions of his own brain. We doubly thank him who links noble thoughts and noble deeds with some great historic name;—who places the hero living before us, till we can read his eye, and hear his voice, and be swayed by his influence. But above all do we thank him when he rescues some great name from dishonour, and drowns the slander forever in the torrent of our sympathies. This Professor Aytoun has done for two of the noblest, yet most misrepresented, names in Scottish annals. 'The Execution of Montrose' and 'The Burial March of Dundee,' are tributes of historical as well as of poetical justice to the two men of all others the most conspicuous for chivalrous virtue in the annals of modern Europe."—Dublin University Magazine, xxxiii. 215.

"The lays before us possess fluency, vigour, and movement, with an elevation of mind which is historical, if not poetical; they have the polish and the skill in the use of figures which might be expected from the professor of rhetoric and belles lettres; they are animated by the sentiment of Jacobinism which is reviving among a certain class of well-minded subjects of Queen Victoria; and they not only display the common knowledge of history, but show, in the prose introductions, that Mr. Aytoun has investigated and thought for himself."—London Spectator.

"Professor Aytoun has selected his ballad themes from striking incidents and from stirring scenes in our mediæval Scottish history: some remote as the field of Flodden; others as recent as that of Drummoyle Muir; and he has thrown over them the light of an imagination at once picturesque and powerful. . . . The perivolum Ingenium Scotorum—that burning, irrepressible energy of character which, whether directed towards good or towards evil, has ever distinguished our country—breathes throughout all his Lays, and lends even to stern fact the etherealising hue of fiction."—D. M. MORRIS: Sketches of the Poetical Literature of the Past Half-Century.

"Finer ballads than these, we are bold to say, are not to be found in the language."—London Times.

"A volume of verse which shows that Scotland has yet a poet. Full of the true fire, it now stirs and swells like a trumpet tone—now sinks in cadences sad and wild as the wail of a Highland dirge."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

2. Fermilian; a Spasmodic Tragedy, by T. Percy Jones, 1854, Edin. and Lon., 12mo.

"It is designed to satirize some modern manifestations of a most false and extravagant taste in poetry; and, although the parody is somewhat long and elaborate, there runs throughout such a happy vein of humour, and the harmony of the verse is so full and flowing, that the reader's interest is never allowed to flag."—*Westm. Babbage, Charles, b. 1790, an eminent mathematician, entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees,—that of B.A. in 1814; was appointed Lucasian Professor in the Univ. of Camb., 1828; resigned in 1839; a member of the principal scientific societies of the world. For a full account of Mr. Babbage's Calculating Machine, see Calculating Machines.—Division Arts and Sciences, English Cyclopædia. The following complete list of his writings has been prepared with care:

1. The Preface, jointly with Sir John Herschel; and (2) Continued Products, in Memoirs of the Analytical Society, 4to, Camb., 1813. 3. Essay towards the Calculus of Functions; Phil. Trans., 1815. 4. Essay towards the Calculus of Functions, Pt. 2; Phil. Trans., 1816. 5. Demonstrations of some of Dr. Matthew Stewart's General Theorems; to which is added an Account of some New Properties of the Circle; Roy. Inst. Jour., 1816, vol. i. 6. These two works were executed in conjunction with the Rev. G. Peacock, Dean of Ely, and Sir John Herschel, Bart. 30. Comparative View of the Different Institutions for the Assurance of Life, 8vo, 1826. A German translation of this work was published for the purpose of establishing at Götting a society for the assurance of lives. 31. A Table of the Logarithms of the Natural Numbers, from 1 to 108,000, 8vo, 1826. These logarithms were used by the computers in the whole of the trigonometric survey of Ireland, and in that part of the English survey subsequent to their publication. There have been several impressions on different-coloured paper,—white, yellow, and fawn. Editions also have been published on white, yellow, and green paper, with the Preface and Introduction translated into the German and Hungarian languages, 1834. 32. Notice respecting some Errors common to many Tables of Logarithms; Mem. Astron. Soc., 4to, 1827, vol. iii. 33. Essay on the General Principles which Regulate the Application of Machinery; *Encyc. Sketch of the Philosophical Characters of Dr. Wollaston and Sir H. Davy; extracted from the Decline of Science. 37. Letter to T. P. Courtenay on the Proportion of Births of the two Sexes amongst Legitimate and Illegitimate Children; Brewster's Edin. Jour. of Science, vol. ii, 1829. 38. Economy of Manufactures and Machinery, 8vo, 1832; 4th ed. There are American reprints, and several translations of this work into German, French, Italian, Spanish, and Russian. 39. Letter to Sir David Brewster on the Advantage of a Collection of the Constants of Nature and Art; Brewster's Edin. Jour. of Science, 1832, vol. vi. p. 334. Reprinted by order of the British Association for the Promotion of Science, Camb., 1833. See also pp. 484, 490.—Report of the Third Meeting of the British Association. 40. Letter, written in Cypher, from Mr. Abraham Sharp to Mr. J. Crosthwait, 2d Feb. 1721–22, relative to a Supposed Error in the Division of the Mural Arc at Greenwich, Deciphered by Mr. Babbage. See Life of Flamsteed by Mr. F. Baily, Appendix, pp. 348, 390, 4to, 1835. 41. Specimen of Logarithmic Tables, printed with different-coloured inks and on variously-coloured papers, in 21 vols. 8vo, Lon., 1831.

The object of this work, of which one single copy only was printed, is to ascertain by experiment the tints of the paper and colours of the inks least fatiguing to the eye.

One hundred and fifty-one variously-coloured papers were chosen, and the same two pages of my stereotype Table of Logarithms were printed upon them in inks of the following colours: light blue, dark blue, light green, dark green, olive, yellow, light red, dark red, purple, and black.

Each of these twenty volumes contains papers of the same colour, numbered in the same order; and there are two volumes printed with each kind of ink.

The twenty-first volume contains metallic printing of the same specimen in gold, silver, and copper, upon vellum and on variously-coloured papers.

For the same purpose, about thirty-five copies of the complete table of logarithms were printed on thick drawing-paper of various tints.

An account of this work may be found in the Edin. Jour. of Science, (Brewster's), 1832, vol. vi. p. 144.

42. Barometrical Observations made at the Fall of the Staubbach, by Sir John Herschel, Bart., and C. Babbage, Esq.; Brewster's Edin. Jour. of Science, 1832, vol. vi. p. 224. 43. The Ninth Bridgewater Treatise, 8vo, May, 1837; 2d ed., Jan. 1838. 44. Essay on the Principles of Tools for Turning and Planing Metals, (inserted in the second volume of Turning and Mechanical Manipulation of Charles Holtzapfel), 1846. 45. Observations on the Temple of Serapis at Pozzuoli, near Naples, with an attempt to explain the causes of the frequent elevation and depression of large portions of the earth's surface in remote periods, and to prove that those causes continue in action at the present time; Proceedings of the Geological Society, 1847. 46. The same Memoir, with a Supplement,—Conjectures on the Physical Condition of the Surface of the Moon, 8vo: privately printed, 1847. 47. The Exposition of 1861; or, Views of the Industry, Science, and Government of England, 1861, 8vo.

Baber, Rev. H. H. Wickliffe's Trans. of the New Testament, Lon., 1811. Psalterium Græcum, a Codex MS. Alexandrinus, Lon., 1812. Mr. Baber published this (by subscription) as a portion of the remainder of the task left unfinished by Woide. Twelve copies were printed upon vellum, to match with the same number of vellum copies of the New Testament published by his predecessor. Mr. Baber, with praiseworthy zeal, was desirous of completing the Old Testament; but this "enterprise of great pith and moment" was more than Mr. Baber could himself, with any propriety, be expected to assume. The trustees of the British Museum applied to Parliament for protection in supplying the means to complete the undertaking. The application was successful; and this great work—Vetus Testamentum Græcum ex Cod. MS. Alexandrino, cura et labore H. H. Baber, A.M.—was completed in 1828, (1816–28), in 4 vols. fol., published at £36 15s.

"The types cast in metal by Jackson for Woide are quite fresh and perfect; and, instead of the contracted various readings in the margin being spun out by the letters in full, (as Woide has given them), fac-similes of such various readings, cut in wood, are inserted precisely in the places where they occur, filling up only the same space with the original. The tail-pieces, or rude arabesque ornaments at the end of each book, are also represented by means of fac-similes in wood; so that the identity of the original is perfectly preserved.

The work, when complete, will consist of 4 folio volumes,—three of the text of the Old Testament, with a fourth containing prolegomena and notes. The subscribers for the vellum copies are:

"His Majesty's Library. Sir M. M. Sykes, Bart.
 "The French King's Library. John Dent, Esq.
 "The Royal Library of Berlin. — Turner, Esq., Trin. Coll., Dubl.
 "The Archbishop of Canterbury. Longman, Hurst & Co., (Pentateuch only.)

"The Duke of Devonshire. The Author.

"The Earl Spencer. (One copy undisposed of).—Dodds's Bibliographical Decameron.

250 copies were printed on paper: the price of the vellum copies was 184 guineas each.

Bache, Alexander Dallas, one of the most distinguished philosophers of the nineteenth century, b. July 19, 1806, in Philadelphia, a great-grandson of Dr. Benj. Franklin; educated at the U.S. Military Acad., West Point; grad. with the highest honours, and became Lieutenant of Engineers of Fortification in 1825; Prof. Math. in Univ. Penna., 1827; organized High School of Phila., and Principal of it, 1841-42; returned to Univ. Penna. 1842-43 as Prof. of Nat. Philos. and Chemistry; resigned on being appointed President of Girard College, Phila. He visited Europe to examine the systems of instruction there, the results of which have been published in one large vol., Phila., 1839, 8vo. A valuable work. In 1833 he edited an ed. of Brewster's Optics, with Notes, Phila., 12mo; Observations at the Magnetic and Meteorological Observatory at the Girard Coll., 3 vols. 8vo, 1 vol. plates, 1840-45, Wash., 1847. In 1843, he was appointed Superintendent of the U.S. Coast Survey, which position he still occupies, (1858.)

"Under his energetic and wise direction it has been fruitful not only in practical benefit to navigators, but in valuable contributions to geodetic and physical science."

The Reports of the U.S. Coast Survey are pub. annually in one large vol. 4to, under the supervision of Professor B., to whose talents it owes its present high position among the learned of both Europe and America. He is a member of the principal scientific societies of the world, and received the medal of the Royal Geog. Soc. for 1858. His principal contributions are 35 valuable papers in the Proc. of the Amer. Ass. for the Advancement of Science, 1849-50-51-53-54-55-56-57-58; 19 papers in the Jour. of the Franklin Institute of Penna., 1831-32-34-35-36-42; 6 papers in the Trans. Amer. Phil. Soc., 1834-35-37-40, &c.; Annual Reports to Treasury Dept. on Weights and Measures from 1844 to '56; Amer. Jour. of Science, 1832-33; Proc. Brit. Ass. for Adv. of Science, 1838, &c.

Bacon, Anne, 1528?-1600? was the second daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, the wife of Sir Nicholas Bacon, and mother of the illustrious Sir Francis Bacon, Baron Verulam. It is worthy of observation that the four daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke all formed distinguished matrimonial alliances: 1. Mildred married Lord Burleigh; 2. Anne, Sir Nicholas Bacon; 3. Elizabeth, Sir John Russell, son of the Earl of Bedford; and, 4. Catherine, Sir Henry Killigrew. The subject of our memoir was eminent for learning and piety, and well versed in the Greek, Latin, and Italian tongues. At an early age she translated from the Italian into English twenty-five sermons, written by Bernardino Ochino, concerning the Predestination and Election of God, published about 1550. She translated Bishop Jewel's Apology for the Church of England, from the original Latin into English. This translation has been commended as "both faithful and elegant." Archbishop Parker, to whom the manuscript had been submitted, returned it printed, "knowing that he had hereby done for the best, and in this point used a reasonable policy; that is, to prevent such excuses as her modesty would have made in stay of publishing it." It was printed in 1564 and in 1600. When she sent the archbishop the MS., it was accompanied with a letter to the prelate in Greek, which he answered in the same language. Beza dedicated to this learned lady his Meditations. Interesting details connected with her literary history will be found in Ballard's Memoirs of British Ladies, and in Birch's Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth, where are some of her letters at length.

Bacon, Delia. Philosophy of the Plays of Shakespeare Unfolded; with a Preface by Nathaniel Hawthorne, Lon., 1857, 8vo.

"From Mr. Hawthorne we learn that Miss Bacon originally meant to issue this book in America, as 'she wished her own country to have the glory of solving the enigma of those mighty dramas and thus adding a new and higher value to the loftiest productions of the English mind.' We grieve to think her purpose failed, and that the book appears with the disadvantage of an English name on the title. Mr. Hawthorne—as every reader of the 'Scarlet Letter' knows—is a humourist of peculiar kind; but his concluding paragraph of introduction to this wild and silly book crowns the list of his drolleries. In the preface to a volume designed to rob Shakespeare of his literary glories, Mr. Hawthorne says, 'It is for the public to say whether my countrywoman has proved her theory. In the worst event, if she has failed, her failure will be more honourable than most people's triumphs; since it must fling upon the old tombstone at Stratford-on-Avon the noblest tributary wreath that has ever lain there.' Fie! Mr. Hawthorne!"—Lon. Athen., April 11, 1857.

Bacon, Francis, Baron Verulam, Viscount St. Alban's, 1560–1–1626, one of the most illustrious of modern philosophers, was the youngest son of Sir Nicholas and Lady Anne Bacon. He was b. at York-House, in the Strand, London, on the 22d of January. As a child he was remarkable for quickness of thought and great precision and force of language. These qualities attracted the notice of Queen Elizabeth, who playfully called him her young Lord Keeper, intimating his probable succession to his father's honours. Ben Jonson represents him as marked for this distinction, even before the sagacity of the Queen had prompted the prediction. Jonson was one of the party who partook of Chancellor Bacon's hospitality at York-house, on January 22, 1620, the sixtieth birthday of the host; the poet celebrated the occasion in choice poetry, of which the following is a specimen:

"Hall, happy genius of this ancient place!
How comes it all things so about thee smile?
The fire, the wine, the men—and in the midst
Thou stand'st, as if some mystery thou didst.
England's high Chancellor, the destined heir
In his soft cradle, to his father's chair;
Whose even thread the fates spin round and full,
Out of their choicest and their whitest wool."

In his 13th year he was entered of Trinity College, Cambridge, where he remained for three years and a half. We must make great allowances for the statement so confidently asserted, that at this early age he had not only detected the fallacies of the philosophy of Aristotle, but had mentally projected the substitution of that "more excellent way" of arriving at truth, the introduction of which has placed him in the first rank of modern philosophers. That he was dissatisfied with the canonical authorities of the prevailing school, and felt that there was a vitality in the teachings of truth which revolted at the artificial barriers so rigidly imposed by the "philosophy falsely so called," to which it was the habit to bow with unquestioning submission—this we do not doubt. He had, to use his own words in later years, taken "all knowledge to be his province," and his was not a mind to be patiently trammelled by any system. After leaving college he visited France, in the train of Sir Amias Paulet. Whilst abroad, he wrote the Notes on the State of Europe, which we find in his works. In February, 1580, he was summoned home by the death of his father. Being very slenderly provided for, he made an application to government to obtain some certain source of income, which would allow him to devote his attention to literature and politics. Most unfortunately for the cause of science, this application was unsuccessful. Choosing the law as his profession, he obtained a good deal of practice, but it is not unlikely that the opinion of the queen was shared by many, and prevented his gaining any brilliant reputation as a profound lawyer. "Bacon," said Elizabeth, "has a great wit and much learning, but in law showeth to the uttermost of his knowledge, and is not deep." There is great reason to suspect much injustice in this opinion. Where he had every right to expect encouragement and aid from his powerful relative, Lord Burleigh, he seems to have encountered any thing but a spirit of kindness and good will. It was natural, therefore, that he should attach himself to the party of Burleigh's opponent, the Earl of Essex; and this nobleman heartily espoused his cause. We grieve to say that the disinterested kindness of the earl was repaid by the basest ingratitude. When his unhappy patron bowed his head in his hour of darkness and desolation, Francis Bacon was by his side,—not as the sympathizing friend, to cheer, to comfort, and to console, but he was there as the accusing fiend, to condemn,—as the heartless executioner, to bind and manacle the victim, and cast him "to the lions." Nor satisfied with this, he hesitated not to affix a stigma to his benefactor's grave, and rehearse, for the information of posterity, the "Declaration of the Treasons of Robert, Earl of Essex!" When we remember this disgraceful transaction, we feel that we have no right to censure the portrait drawn by a great poet, of our greater author—

"The wisest, brightest, meanest, of mankind."

Yet Mr. Montagu can herein justify Bacon, and plead for him "as a man pleadeth for his first-born!" How true it is that the biographer and the lover are almost synonymous terms! Mr. Montagu, in order to defend a bad cause, is obliged, as is usual in such cases, to plead a bad principle; viz. that a lawyer in the advocacy of his brief is permitted, nay obliged, to ignore moral honesty, truth, justice, and every other virtue, if the interest of his client shall require such a tremendous sacrifice, such wholesale abnegation of the very foundations of public and private morality. We do not use Mr. Montagu's phraseology, but we do not "in the estimation of a hair" overstrain the statement of what is done every day in our "courts of justice." (!) Mr. Macaulay's remarks upon this subject, and in the same connexion, are much to the purpose. See his Essay on Lord Bacon.

In 1593 he sat as member for the county of Middlesex. Fortunately, we have a graphic sketch of Bacon as the orator, by his friend Ben Jonson:

"There happened in my time one noble speaker who was full of gravity in his speaking. His language, when he could spare or pass by a jest, was nobly censorious. No man ever spoke more neatly, more pressly, more weightily, or suffered less emptiness, less idleness, in what he uttered. No member of his speech but consisted of his own graces. His hearers could not cough or look aside from him without loss. He commanded where he spoke, and had his judges angry and pleased at his devotion. No man had their affections more in his power. The fear of every man that heard him was lest he should make an end."—Discoveries.

Bacon's earliest publication was the first part of his celebrated Essays, or Counsels, afterwards considerably augmented. The Elements of the Common Law of England, written in 1596, and The History of the Alienation Office, written in 1598, were not published until after his death. The Essays attained immediate popularity, and were translated into Latin, French, and Italian.

In July, 1603, Bacon was presented to King James I., at Whitehall, and received the honour of knighthood. In 1604 he was appointed King's Counsel; shortly after which he married Alice, the daughter of Benedict Barnham, Esq., Alderman. In the next year appeared his treatise on The Advancement of Learning, which was the basis of the De Augmentis. The De Sapientia Veterum was published in 1609.

In 1616, Sir Francis Bacon was sworn of the Privy Council, and in March, 1617, he received the appointment of Keeper of the Great Seal. He was much beholden for his preferment to the influence of Buckingham, and not a little to his personal solicitation of the King, in which he was not backward to assert his merits and fitness for the post of Lord Keeper. On the 4th of January, 1618, he was made Lord High Chancellor, and on the 11th of July ensuing he was ennobled by the title of Baron of Verulam, and three years later was raised to the dignity of Viscount St. Alban's. Fain would we leave him in this exalted position, but, alas! a great fall was at hand. King James had been compelled by his necessities to summon a Parliament; and its Committee in the Courts of Justice reported on the 15th March, that abuses of no common order had been charged.

"The Person," said the chairman, "against whom the things are alleged, is no less than the Lord Chancellor; a man so endued with all parts, both of nature and of art, as that I will say no more of him, being not able to say enough."

Our limits forbid any other than a brief notice of this melancholy portion of the Lord Chancellor's history. The reader will find an admirable analysis of the whole subject, as well as of the Baconian philosophy, in Mr. Macaulay's well-known essay on Lord Bacon. That there were extenuating circumstances in the well-founded charges against the Chancellor, may be admitted, without making him a false witness against himself in his memorable confession.

"Upon advised consideration of the charges, descending into my own conscience, and calling my memory to account as far as I am able, I do plainly and ingenuously confess that I am guilty of corruption, and do renounce all defence."

To the committee of the Lords who were sent to inquire if this confession were indeed signed by himself, his pathetic answer was: "My Lords, it is my act, my hand, my heart. I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed!"

The sentence passed upon the offender was a fine of £40,000, imprisonment in the Tower during the King's pleasure, incapacity to hold any office in the state, or to sit in Parliament, and banishment for life from the verge of the Court. This heavy sentence proved to be little more than a matter of form. He was confined in the Tower but two days, his fine was released by the King, he was suffered to appear at Court, and in 1624 the political incapacity under which he still suffered was removed. His seat as a peer in the House of Lords was again open to him, and he was summoned to the next Parliament, though he thought proper to decline attendance. His habits of improvidence still followed him in his retreat. The teacher of philosophic humility and moderation excited the astonishment of a prince by his ostentation, and the author of the Essays on Economy and Improvidence was continually harassed by domestic debts. Prince Charles, encountering his imposing equipage and numerous train on the road, exclaimed with admiration: "Do what we can, this man seems to go out in snuff."

His faithful friend, Rare Ben Jonson, groups together his sunshine and twilight in a few pathetic lines:

"My conceit of his person was never increased towards him by his place or honours; but I have and do reverence him for the greatness that was only proper to himself, in that he seemed to me ever, by his work, one of the greatest men and most worthy of admiration that had been in many ages. In his adversity I ever prayed that God would give him strength; for greatness he could not want."

The ex-chancellor survived his political bankruptcy five years. The cause of his death is well known. Anxious to test a theory that he had formed relative to the efficacy of snow in arresting animal putrefaction, he one cold day left his coach, near Highgate, bought a fowl at an adjoining cottage, and stuffed it with snow. He was suddenly seized with an alarming sensation of chilliness, and was carried to the mansion of the Earl of Arundel, at Highgate, where he lingered for a week, and expired on Easter morning, 1626, in the arms of his friend, Sir Julius Cæsar. His last letter was written to his host, who was then absent from home. In this letter he calls himself the "martyr of science," and compares himself to Pliny the Elder, who lost his life in the cause of investigation. In his will he leaves his name and memory to men's charitable speeches, "to foreign nations, and to my own countrymen, after some time be passed over."

We shall now proceed to review, briefly, the literary productions of the distinguished subject of our memoir. We have already referred to Mr. Basil Montagu as a biographer, and frankly expressed our dissent from some of his conclusions respecting the character of one the influence of whose name is great enough for any thing but successful resistance to the verdict of unconquerable truth. But we should be justly blamed did we omit to record our gratitude to Mr. Montagu for his splendid edition of the Works of Lord Bacon, in 17 vols. 8vo, 1825-34: £8 18s. 6d.; large paper, £26 15s. 6d. See ELLIS, R. LESLIE.

It is deeply to be regretted that Lord Bacon never carried out a favourite plan long cherished by him, of "Reducing or perfecting the course, or corps, of the Common Law, digesting or recompiling them, so that the entire body and substance of Law should remain; only discharged of idle, or unprofitable, or hurtful matter. I dare not advise to cast the law into a new mould. The work which I propound tendeth to pruning and grafting the Laws, and not to ploughing up and planting it again; for such remove I hold a perilous innovation."

His Elements of the Laws of England, published in 1636, consists of, 1. A Collection of some Principal Rules and Maxims of the Common Law, with their Latitude and Extent. We have here but twenty-five out of three hundred Rules which he had collected:

"I thought good, before I brought them all into form, to publish some few, that by the taste of other men's opinions, in this first, I might receive either approbation in my own course, or better advice for the altering of others which remain: for it is great reason that that which is intended to the profit of others, should be guided by the conceits of others."

The excellence of that which we possess makes us grieve that we have so small a proportion of that which the author designed:

"Though some great masters of the Law did outgo him in bulk and particularly in cases: yet in the science of the grounds, and mysteries of the Law, he was exceeded by none."—Preface to Blackstone's Anal.

What an invaluable acquisition to the legal and philosophical literature of the world would have been Bacon's Illustrations of Three Hundred Rules and Maxims of the Common Law! With that keenness of perception, profundity of judgment, and critical accuracy of definition, which distinguished this legal philosopher, we should have had a noble compend of juridical wisdom; an invaluable auxiliary to the teachings of that Volume which enforces equity and truth in the duties of this life by the solemn sanctions of the life to come. Bacon's royal master would then have had a double claim upon the gratitude of mankind, in the inestimable version of the inspired Scriptures, and in one of the grandest conceptions of human wisdom. The second portion of The Elements of the Common Law, was styled by its author, The Use of the Law for Preservation of our Persons, Goods, and Good Names, according to the Laws of this Land. This treatise has been praised as

"Not only completely fitted for the improvement of such as study the Law, but also the Book in the world best calculated to give every man of good sense and unbiased judgment, both a general idea, and a good opinion of the Law, which is represented therein in that light which is at once the fairest, fullest, and most agreeable."

The best-known law treatise of Lord Bacon is his Reading on the Statute of Uses, which was delivered before the Society of Gray's Inn about the year 1600. This can be considered only an unfinished design:

"A profound treatise on the subject, as far as it goes."—HARGRAVE. The History of the Alienation Office has been cited as a proof of

"How great a master he was not in one Law only, but in our History and Antiquities; so that it may be justly said, there never fell any thing from his pen which more clearly and fully demonstrated his abilities."

The History of Henry VII. has been censured by Dr. Johnson as evincing a want of care usual to the day:

"It is but of late that Historians bestow pains and attention in consulting records, to attain to accuracy. Bacon, in writing his History of Henry VII., does not seem to have consulted any, but to have just taken what he found in other histories, and blended it with what he learned by tradition."

But Bishop Nicolson, speaking of the authors who have written concerning the reign of Henry VII., cannot sufficiently commend our historian:

"This good work was most effectually undertaken and completed by the incomparable Sir Francis Bacon, who has bravely surmounted all those difficulties, and passed over those rocks and shallows, against which he took such pains to caution other less experienced historians. He has perfectly put himself into King Henry's own garb and livery, giving as sprightly a view of the secrets of his Council, as if himself had been President in it."—English Historical Library.

Catherine Macaulay, on the other hand, blames the historian for flattering King James

"So far as to paint his grandfather, Henry the Seventh, in an amiable light."—Catherine Macaulay's History of England, vol. I.

We proceed to the consideration of Bacon's philosophical writings. His Essays, or Counsels, Civil and Moral, were first published in 1597; 2d edition, with additions, in 1612; 3d, still further augmented, in 1624. In the dedication to his brother, Anthony Bacon, the author states that he published his Essays "because many of them had stolen abroad in writing," and he was anxious to give a correct impression of them.

"To write just treatises requires leisure in the writer, and leisure in the reader. . . . The word [Essays] is late, but the thing is ancient; for Seneca's Epistles to Lucilius, if you mark them well, are but Essays, that is, dispersed meditations, though conveyed in the form of Epistles."—From the intended Preface to the 2d edition.

This is the work by which Bacon is best known to the majority of readers.

"The first in time, and we may justly say, the first in excellence, of English writings on moral prudence, are the Essays of Bacon. . . . The transcendent strength of Bacon's mind is visible in the whole tenor of these Essays, unequal as they must be from the very nature of such compositions. They are deeper and more discriminating than any earlier, or almost any later, work in the English language; full of recondite observations, long matured, and carefully sifted. . . . Few books are more quoted, and what is not always the case with such books, we may add, that few are more generally read. In this respect they lead the van of our prose literature; for no gentleman is ashamed of owning that he has not read the Elizabethan writers; but it would be somewhat derogatory to a man of the slightest claim to polite letters, were he unacquainted with the Essays of Bacon."—Hallam's Introduction to the Lit. of Europe.

"The virtue of these Essays is too well allowed to require any comment. Without the elegance of Addison, or the charming egotism of Montaigne, they have acquired the widest circulation; and if Bacon had written no more, they would have bequeathed his name undying to posterity. Burke preferred them to the rest of his writings, and Dr. Johnson observed, that 'their excellence and value consists in their being the observations of a strong mind operating upon life, and, in consequence, you will find there what you seldom find in other books.'"—Malone's Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds: Ross's Biog. Dict.: read the whole of this excellent sketch of Bacon and his writings.

"Under the head of Ethics may be mentioned the small volume to which he has given the title of Essays; the best known and the most popular of all his works. It is also one of those where the superiority of his genius appears to the greatest advantage; the novelty and depth of his reflections often receiving a strong relief from the triteness of his subject. It may be read from beginning to end in a few hours; and yet, after the twentieth perusal, one seldom fails to remark in it something overlooked before. This indeed is a characteristic of all Bacon's writings, and is only to be accounted for by the inexhaustible amount they furnish to our own thoughts, and the sympathetic activity they impart to our torpid faculties."—Dugald Stewart, 1st Præl. Diss. to Encyc. Brit.

About the 26th year of his age, Bacon formed the first sketch of the great work which he designed completing in his "Instauration of the Sciences." This sketch he entitled Temporis Partus Maximus; The Greatest Birth of Time. In writing, towards the close of his life, to Father Fulgentio, a learned Italian, who had asked of him an account of his works, he remarks,

"Equidem meminisse quadraginta abhinc annis juvenile opusculum circa hæc res conscribere, quod magnæ proutus fiducie et magnifico titulo, 'Temporis Partus Maximus,' inscripsi."

The Treatise on the Advancement of Learning, which was the germ of the De Augmentis Scientiarum, (pub. 1623,) was published in 1605.

"In this, indeed, the whole of the Baconian philosophy may be said to be implicitly contained, except, perhaps, the second book of the Novum Organum."

De Sapientia Veterum [The Wisdom of the Ancients] 1609. "Written," as he says, "in the midst of a term and Parliament."

"A work which, if it had proceeded from any other writer, would have been considered as a masterpiece of wit and learning, but which adds little to the fame of Bacon."—T. B. MACAULAY.

In this work, he applies morally or politically

"Most of the fables of the Greek Mythology, sometimes displaying remarkable acuteness and penetration; at other times an exuberance of fancy which amuses rather than instructs."

Novum Organum, 1620. This work was immediately honoured by "the warmest expressions of admiration from the ablest men of Europe."

"The greatest of all his works, and the central pile of that edifice of philosophy on which the world has bestowed his name. The Novum Organum was received with unbounded applause of the learned, both in his own and foreign nations, and placed the fame of its author at once above that of every other living author."

This work was valued by Bacon above all his other writings; twelve times was it revised, altered, and corrected, year by year, before publication. This ambitious title, in which the author enters the lists with the ancient "Organon," the logical text-book of Aristotle, shows the confidence which the modern philosopher entertained in the value of his improvements in the art of reasoning. This production is to be accepted as the second part of the Instauration Magna, which he tells us was to be "the science of a better and more perfect use of reason in the investigation of things, and of the true aids to the understanding;" in other words, an exposition of the inductive method; what we now term the Baconian philosophy. The Novum Organum by no means answers the expressed design of the author. We mean that he has not filled his own sketch.

"The aphorisms into which he has digested it being rather the heads or theses of chapters, at least in many places, that would have been further expanded. And it is still more important to observe that he did not achieve the whole of this summary that he had promised; but out of nine divisions of his method, we only possess the first, which he denominates prærogative. Eight others, of exceeding importance to logic, he has not touched at all, except to describe them by name, and to promise more. . . . His terminology is often a little affected, and, in Latin, rather barbarous. The divisions of his prerogative instances in the Novum Organum, are not always founded upon intelligible distinctions. And the general obscurity of the style, neither himself nor his assistants being good masters of the Latin language, which, at the best, is never flexible or copious enough for our philosophy, renders the perusal of both his great works too laborious for the impatient reader. Brucker has well observed that the Novum Organum has been neglected by the generality, and proved of far less service than it would otherwise have been in philosophy, in consequence of these very defects, as well as the real depth of the author's mind."—HALLAM.

To the celebrated Sir Henry Wotton the author sent three copies of this book, which gift was rewarded by a very laudatory letter from this famous statesman, diplomatist, and author. The Novum Organum has received the commendations of very eminent authorities, both in the author's own time, and in every successive generation. Like all productions of genius, it likewise elicited some censorious criticisms.

"The geniuses laughed at it, and men of talent and acquirement, whose studies had narrowed their minds into particular channels, incapable of understanding its reasonings, and appreciating its originality, turned wits for the purpose of ridiculing the new publication of the philosophic Lord Chancellor. Dr. Andrews, a forgotten wit of those days, perpetrated a vile pun upon the town and title of St. Alban's, by saying, in some doggerel verse, that it was on the high road to Dunstable. I. a. Dunstable, and therefore appropriate to the author of such a book. Mr. Secretary Cuffs said that it was 'a book which a fool could not have written, and a wise man would not.' King James declared it was like the Peace of God—"It passeth all understanding." Coke wrote, under a device on the title page, of a ship passing through the pillars of Hercules,

"It deserveth not to be read in schools,
But to be freighted in the ship of fools."

To such hypercriticism, the author's faithful friend in prosperity and affliction—the friend who had rejoiced in the rise, and wept over the fall, of "England's High Chancellor," who not only participated in his festive hospitality in that "high day," when "all things did about him smile," but entered into his closet on his behalf, in his hour of darkness and disgrace, to pray that God would "give him strength in his day of adversity,"—twice Rare Ben Jonson thus adverts, when he declares that the Novum Organum, "Though by the most of superficial men who cannot get beyond the title of Nominals, it is not penetrated or understood, it really openeth all defects of learning whatsoever, and is a book 'Qui longum noto scriptori prorsus ævum.'"

"To latest time shall hand the author's name."

Morhof, in his Polyhistor, commends this work in the highest terms, remarking that he "Had found but very little in the books since written by Englishmen, the grounds of which he had not long before met with in Bacon; the extent of his genius struck him with admiration, as it must do every man who takes the pains to understand him; because, though this new knowledge of his is very difficult, and requires much study and application to master it, yet it leads to the knowledge of things, and not of words."

Voltaire is not behind in commendation:

"The most singular and the best of all his pieces is that which is most useless and least read, I mean his Novum Scientiarum Organum; this is the scaffold with which the new Philosophy was raised, and when the edifice was built, part of it, at least the scaffold, was no longer of service. The Lord Bacon was not yet acquainted with nature, but then he knew, and pointed out, the several paths that led to it."—Letters on the English Nation; quoted in the Encyc. Brit. The whole of this excellent article should be perused.

Let us quote the opinions of a few modern writers:

"Though he possessed, in a most eminent degree, the genius of philosophy, he did not unite with it the genius of the sciences; the methods proposed by him for the investigation of truth, consisting entirely of precepts which he was unable to exemplify, had little or no effect in accelerating the rate of discovery."—CONDORCET: in Dugald Stewart's Præl. Diss. to Encyc. Brit.

"The merits of Bacon, as the father of Experimental Philosophy, are so universally acknowledged, that it would be superfluous to touch upon them here. The lights which he has struck out in various branches of the Philosophy of Mind have been much less attended to. . . . In the extent and accuracy of his physical knowledge, he was far inferior to many of his predecessors; but he surpassed them all in his knowledge of the laws, the resources, and the limits of the human understanding."—DUGALD STEWART, ibid.

"Without any disparagement to the admirable treatise De Augmentis, we must say, that in our judgment, Bacon's greatest performance is the first book of the Novum Organum. All the peculiarities of his extraordinary mind are found there in the highest perfection. Many of the aphorisms, but particularly those in which he gives examples of the influence of the idols, show a nicety of observation that has never been surpassed. Every part of the book bristles with wit, but with wit which is employed only to illustrate and decorate truth. No book ever made so great a revolution in the mode of thinking, overthrew so many prejudices, introduced so many new opinions."—T. B. MACAULAY: the reader should peruse and re-peruse this admirable article.

The De Augmentis Scientiarum, a translation of the Advancement of Learning, revised and enlarged, (see ante), was published in 1623. The Biblical Simile of King James has been imputed to this, as well as the preceding work. The translation was made by Ben Jonson, George Herbert, and other friends.

Apothegms, 1625.

"The best jest-book ever given to the public."—Edin. Rev., No. 182.

Translation of Psalms into English Verse, 1625.

"Aubrey declared Lord Bacon to have been a good poet, but in this work his plety is more to be commended than his poetry. It was dedicated to his friend, the incomparable George Herbert."

Among his principal works may also be reckoned the Sylva Sylvarum and the New Atlantis. A list will be found in Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica. Mr. Montagu's complete edition, published 1825-34, comprises no less than 17 volumes. As the reader will frequently find in notices of Bacon's philosophy references to the Instauration Magna, or Instauration of the Sciences, we can hardly properly dismiss our subject without giving a brief programme (abbreviated from Mr. Hallam's excellent Introduction to the Lit. of Europe—a book which should be in every library) of this noble project of Lord Bacon:

"The Instauration Magna, dedicated to James, is divided, according to the magnificent ground-plan of its author, into six parts.

"The first of these he entitles Partitiones Scientiarum, comprehending a general summary of that kind of knowledge which mankind already possess; yet not merely treating this affirmatively, but taking special notice of whatever should seem deficient or imperfect; sometimes even supplying, by illustration or precept, these vacant spaces of science. This first part he declares to be wanting in the Instauratio. It has been chiefly supplied by the treatise De Augmentis Scientiarum; yet, perhaps, even that does not fully come up to the amplitude of his design.

"The second part of the Instauratio was to be, as he expresses it, 'the science of a better and more perfect use of reason in the investigation of things, and of the true aids of the understanding,' the new logic or inductive method in which what is eminently styled the Baconian philosophy consists. This, as far as he completed it, is known to all by the name of the Novum Organum. But he seems to have designed a fuller treatise in place of this; the aphorisms into which he has digested it being rather the heads or theses of chapters, at least in many places, that would have been farther expanded. It is entitled by himself Partis secundae summa, digesta in aphorismos." See preceding remarks.

"The third part of the Instauratio Magna was to comprise an entire natural history, diligently and scrupulously collected from experience of every kind; including under that name of natural history every thing wherein the art of man has been employed on natural substances, either for practice or experiment; no method of reasoning being sufficient to guide us to truth as to natural things, if they are not themselves clearly and exactly apprehended. It is unnecessary to observe that very little of this immense chart of nature could be traced by the hand of Bacon, or in his time. His Centuries of Natural History, containing about one thousand observed facts and experiments, are a very slender contribution towards such a description of universal nature as he contemplated: these form no part of the Instauratio Magna, and had been compiled before. . . .

"The fourth part, called Scala Intellectus, is also wanting, with the exception of a very few introductory pages. 'By these tables,' says Bacon, 'we mean not such examples as we subjoin to the several rules of our method, but types and models, which place before our eyes the entire progress of the mind in the discovery of truth, selecting various and remarkable instances.' . . .

"In the fifth part of the Instauratio Magna, Bacon had designed to give a specimen of the new philosophy which he hoped to raise after a due use of his natural history and inductive method, by way of anticipation or sample of the whole. He calls it Prodromi, sive Anticipationes Philosophiæ Secundæ. And some fragments of this part are published by the names Cogitata et Visa, Cogitationes de Natura Rerum, Filum Labyrinthi, and a few more, being as much, in all probability, as he had reduced to writing. In his own metaphor, it was to be like the payment of interest till the principal could be raised; tanquam census reddatur, donec sors haberi possit.

"For he despaired of ever completing the work by a sixth and last portion, which was to display a perfect system of philosophy, deduced and confirmed by a legitimate, sober, and exact inquiry, according to the method which he had invented and laid down.

"To perfect this last part is above our powers, and beyond our hopes. We may, as we trust, make no despicable beginnings; the destinies of the human race must complete it; in such a manner, perhaps, as men looking only at the present would not readily conceive. For upon this will depend not only a speculative good, but all the fortunes of mankind, and all their power.' And with an eloquent prayer that his exertions may be rendered effectual to the attainment of truth and happiness, this introductory chapter of the Instauratio, which announces the distribution of its portions, concludes. Such was the temple, of which Bacon saw in vision before him the stately front and decorated pediments, in all their breadth of light and harmony of proportion, while long vistas of receding columns and glimpses of internal splendour revealed a glory that it was not permitted him to comprehend. In the treatise De Augmentis Scientiarum, and in the Novum Organum, we have less, no doubt, than Lord Bacon, under different conditions of life, might have achieved; he might have been more emphatically the high-priest of nature, if he had not been the Chancellor of James I.; but no one man could have filled up the vast outline which he alone, in that stage of the world, could have so boldly sketched."

It is proper to refer to Bacon's celebrated division of Human Learning, into the three branches of—1. History; 2. Poetry; and 3. Philosophy; (vide De Augmentis Scientiarum, lib. I.) connected with—1. Memory; 2. Imagination; and 3. Reason. Bacon's Intellectual Chart has been corrected and improved by his ingenious disciple, D'Alembert. The subject is a tempting one for enlargement, but we have already far exceeded our intended limits, and must refer our reader for information on this and other topics connected with the Baconian philosophy to the 1st and 3d Prel. Diss. to the Encyc. Brit. The names of Stewart and Playfair afford a sufficient guarantee for instruction and entertainment.

Having thus reviewed at some length the principal works of Lord Bacon, perhaps a fitting conclusion to our sketch will be a citation of some opinions, in addition to those we have presented, respecting an author who has been not extravagantly lauded as the "Glory and ornament of his age and nation:"

"Though there was bred in Mr. Bacon so early a dislike of the Philosophy of Aristotle, yet he did not despise him with that pride and haughtiness with which youth is wont to be puffed up. He had a just esteem of that great master of learning, greater than that which Aristotle expressed himself towards the philosophers that went before him; for he endeavoured (some say) to stifle all their labours, designing to himself an universal monarchy over opinions, as his patron Alexander did over men. Our hero owned what was excellent in him, but in his inquiries into nature he proceeded not upon his principles. He began the work anew, and laid the foundation of philosophic theory in numerous experiments."—ARCHBISHOP TRENCH: Baconica.

George Sandys, the poet and traveller, in his learned notes on his version of Ovid's Metamorphoses, acknowledges himself to be much beholden to the De Sapientia Veterum, and styles the writer the "crown of all modern authors."

"This plan as laid down by him looks liker an universal art than a distinct logic, and the design is too great, and the induction too large to be made by one man, or any society of men in one age, if at all practicable. For whatever opinion he might have of the conclusiveness of this way, one cross circumstance in an experiment would as easily overthrow his induction, as an ambiguous word would disorder a syllogism; and a man needs only make a trial in any part of natural history, as left us by my Lord Bacon, to see how conclusive his induction was like to have been. To say nothing, that notwithstanding his blaming the common logics, as being too much spent in words, himself runs into the fault he condemns: for what else can we make of his Idola Tribus, Idola Specus, Fori, Theatri; or of his instantia solitaria, migrantis, ostensive, clausæ, constitutivæ, &c., but fine words put to express very common and ordinary things?"—BAKER.

Mr. T. B. Macaulay has a criticism upon the Baconian terminology somewhat of the same character as Mr. Baker's, which he thus humorously phrases:

"We are not inclined to ascribe much practical value to the analysis of the inductive method which Bacon has given in the second book of the Novum Organum. It is indeed an elaborate and correct analysis. But it is an analysis of that which we are all doing from morning to night, and which we continue to do even in our dreams. A plain man finds his stomach out of order. He never heard Lord Bacon's name. [He must, indeed, be a "plain man," like Jacob, "dwelling in tents," never to have heard of Lord Bacon.] But he proceeds in the strictest conformity with the rules laid down in the second book of the Novum Organum, and satisfies himself that minced pies have done the mischief. 'I ate minced pies on Monday and Wednesday, and I was kept awake by indigestion all night.' This is the comparentia instantiarum instantiarum convenientem. 'I did not eat any on Tuesday and Friday, and I was quite well.' This is the comparentia instantiarum instantiarum proxime quæ natura data præcavetur. 'I ate very sparingly of them on Sunday, and was very slightly indisposed in the evening. But on Christmas-day I almost dined on them, and was so ill that I was in some danger.' This is the comparentia instantiarum secundum magis et minus. 'It cannot have been the brandy which I took with them; for I have drunk brandy daily for years without being the worse for it.' This is the rejection naturæ. Our invalid then proceeds to what is termed by Bacon the Vindemiatist, and pronounces that minced pies do not agree with him. We might go on to what are called by Bacon prævarigationes instantiarum. For example: 'It must be something peculiar to minced pies, for I can eat any other pastry without the least bad effect.' This is the instantia solitaria. We might easily proceed, but we have already sufficiently explained our meaning."

Now this is all very amusing, but whether it have any other merit, we leave it to the reader to decide. We contend that this devoted to minced pies argues more like a philosopher who had profited by the inductive mode, (although perhaps ignorant of its terminology,) than "plain men who have never heard of Lord Bacon" are apt to reason. Further, it is not indispensable to a "plain man's" profiting by the Baconian system, that he should have heard of Lord Bacon. It is with philosophy as with the light of the sun—thousands enjoy its advantages where one understands its nature. The question is whether the reveller in minced pies in the 19th century, be not more favourably situated for the correction of undue indulgence, than was his brother epicure of the 16th century. Or whether a man who was put to bed by minced pies under the Organon of Aristotle, would not suffer a daily repetition of the offence and penalty, instead of reasoning and abjuring, as does Mr. Macaulay's invalid, under the brighter dispensation of the Organon of Bacon. Besides, the whole business of life is not to luxuriate in minced pies: the Mart, the Forum, the Altar, and the Camp, all have their duties and their codes, which, if based upon reason, may be perfected by induction; and unless Mr. Macaulay indited his able essay about Christmas-time, for the January number of the Edinburgh, we cannot conceive how he happened to select so odd an illustration of the instantiarum convenientem. But to be serious: we happen to remember a passage of Mr. Hallam's, bearing upon such objections as those advanced by Mr. Baker and Mr. Macaulay; whether meant for these gentlemen or not, we have no means of knowing, but his reflections could not be more to the purpose:

"Those who object to the importance of Lord Bacon's precepts in philosophy, that mankind have practised many of them immemorially, are rather confirming their utility, than taking off much from their originality to any fair sense of that term. Every logical method is built on the common faculties of human nature, which have been exercised since the Creation in discerning, better or worse, truth from falsehood, and inferring the unknown from the known. That men might have done this more correctly, is manifest from the quantity of error into which, from want of reasoning well on what came before them, they have habitually fallen. In experimental philosophy, to which the more special rules of Lord Bacon are generally referred, there was a notorious want of that very process of reasoning which he has supplied."—Introduction to Lit. Europe, vol. II.

Bushel, in his Abridgment of Bacon's Philosophical Theory in Mineral Prosecutions, gives a pathetic account of the sad fall of the Lord Chancellor:

"Shortly after the king dissolved the Parliament, but never restored that matchless lord to his place, which made him then to wish the many years he had spent in state policy and law study had been solely devoted to true philosophy: for (said he) the one, at the best, doth but comprehend man's frailty in its greatest splendour; but the other the mysterious knowledge of all things created in the six days' work."

We need no voucher for the authenticity of this reflection! It is Lord Bacon's! The image and the superscription are there! We are told by Rushworth that

"He treasured up nothing for himself or family, but was over indulgent to his servants, and connived at their takings, and their ways betrayed him to that error: they were profuse and expensive, and had at their command whatever he was master of."

"Who can forbear to observe and lament the weakness and infirmity of human nature? To see a man so far exalted above the common level of his fellow-creatures, to sink so far below it; to see a man who, like Seneca, gave admirable rules for the conduct of life, and condemning the avaricious pursuit after riches, and, what is unlike Seneca, condemning them in his own person, and yet be dashed thereby."—Stephens's Introduction to Bacon's Letters.

"The Chancellor being convicted of bribery, pretends, as if being weary of honour, he would resign his place, being much loaded with calumnies."—Clarendon's Annals of King James.

"His great spirit was brought low, and this humiliation might have raised him again, if his offences had not been so weighty as to keep him down. . . . He was a fit jewel to have beautified and adorned a flourishing kingdom, if his flaws had not disgraced the lustre that should have set him off."—Wilson's Life and Reign of King James.

"The Parliament was prorogued at Easter, from the 27th of March to the 18th of April, the marquis having his eye therein upon the Lord Chancellor, to try if time could mitigate the displeasure, which in both Houses was strong against him."—Hacker's Life of Archbishop Williams.

An eminent authority remarks that "The Earl of Salisbury was an excellent speaker, but no good penman; Lord Henry Howard was an excellent penman, but no good speaker; Sir Francis Bacon alike eminent for both."—Sir Walter Raleigh.

Lord Bacon committed his Orations and Epistles to the care of Archbishop Williams, who addressed him as follows:

"Your Lordship doth most worthily, therefore, in preserving these two pieces among the rest of those matchless monuments you shall leave behind you; considering that as one age hath not bred your experience, so is it not fit it should be confined to one age, and not imparted to the times to come; for my part therein, I do embrace the honour with all thankfulness, and the trust imposed upon me with all religion and devotion."

"Your Lordship hath done a great and everlasting benefit to all the children of Nature, and to Nature herself in her utmost extent of latitude, who never before had so noble nor so true an interpreter, or (as I am reader to style your Lordship) never so inward a Secretary of her cabinet."—Letter from Sir Henry Wotton, on receiving a copy of the Novum Organum.

The University of Oxford, shortly after his fall, acknowledged, in the most laudatory terms, the gift of a copy of the De Augmentis Scientiarum:

"Right honourable, and what in nobility is almost a miracle, most learned Viscount! Your honour could have given nothing more agreeable, and the University could have received nothing more acceptable than the Sciences. . . . She readily acknowledgeth, that though the Muses are born in Oxford, they grow elsewhere: grown they are, and under your pen, who, like some mighty Hercules in learning, have by your own hand, further advanced those pillars in the learned world, which by the rest of that world were supposed immovable."

Mr. Francis Osborn declares that Bacon was "The most universal genius he had ever seen, or was ever like to see, had he lived ever so long. He was so excellent, so agreeable a speaker, that all who heard him were uneasy if he was interrupted, and sorry when he concluded. . . . Now this general knowledge he had in all things hushed by his wit, and dignified by so majestic a carriage, he was known to own, struck such an awful reverence in those he questioned, that they durst not conceal the most intrinsic part of their mysteries from him, for fear of appearing ignorant or saucy: all which rendered him no less necessary than admirable at the Council-table, where in reference to impositions, monopolies, &c., where the meanest manufactures were a usual argument; and, as I have heard, did in this battle the Earl of Middlesex, that was born and bred a Citizen; yet without any great, (if at all) interrupting his other studies, as is not hard to be imagined of a quick apprehension, in which he was admirable."—Miscell. Works of Francis Osborn, 1722.

"Pity it was he was not entertained with some liberal salary, abstracted from all affairs both of court and judicature, and furnished with sufficiency both of means and helps for the going on of his design; which, had it been, he might have given us such a body of Natural Philosophy, and made it so subservient to the public good, that neither Aristotle nor Theophrastus amongst the Ancients, nor Paracelsus, or the rest of our latest chymists, would have been considerable."—Dr. Peter Huxley: Life of Archb. Laud.

Cowley, in his Pindaric on the Royal Society, lauds the "mighty discoveries of the great Lord Bacon."

"Methinks," says Bishop Sprat in his History of the Royal Society, "in this one man I do at once find enough occasion to admire the strength of human wit, and to bewail the weakness of a mortal condition; for is it not wonderful, that he who had run through all the degrees of that profession which usually takes up men's whole time, who had studied, and practised, and governed the Common Law, who had always lived in the crowd, and borne the greatest burden of civil business, should yet find leisure enough for these retired studies, to excel all those men who separate themselves for this very purpose? He was a man of strong, clear, powerful imagination; his genius was searching and invincible, and of this I need give no other proof than his style itself; which, as, for the most part, it describes men's minds as well as pictures do their bodies, so it did his above all men living; the course of it vigorous and majestic; the wit, bold and familiar; the comparisons, fetched out of the way, and yet the most easy; in all, expressing a soul equally skilled in men and nature."

"The incomparable Mr. Boyle speaks often of our author in his works, and always with honour; he styles him sometimes an illustrious, at others, an admirable and excellent, Philosopher, and, which is a higher commendation than any phrase could have expressed, he often imitates him, and professes a desire of treading in his paths. Dr. Power, one of the most active and judicious among the first members of the Royal Society, in a learned treatise of his, places at the head of his chapters the Latin text from the Lord Verulam's works, to shew that all the honour he had claimed was to have prosecuted his views."

"No trivial passages, (referring to the Life of Henry VII.) such as are below the notice of a statesman, are mixed with his sage remarks; nor is any thing of weight or moment slubbered over with that careless haste and indifference which is too common in other writers. No allowances are given to the author's own conjecture or invention, where a little pains and consideration will serve to set the matter in its proper and true light. No impertinent digressions, nor fanciful comments distract his readers; but the whole is written in such a grave and uniform style, as becomes both the subject and the artificer."—Bassor Nicolson: English Historical Library.

On the other hand, Catherine Macaulay objects to the portraiture of Henry VII., as we have seen, and prefaces her dissent with some very severe strictures on the author:

"Thus ignominious was the fall of the famous Bacon! despicable in all the active parts of life, and only glorious in the contemplative. Him the rays of knowledge served but to embellish, not enlighten; and philosophy itself was degraded by a conjunction with his mean soul: we are told that he often lamented that ambition and vain glory had diverted him from spending his whole time in the manner worthy of his extensive genius; but there is too much reason to believe, from his conduct, that these sentiments arose from the weight of his mortifications, and not from the conviction of his judgment. He preferred mean applications to James, and continued to flatter him so far as to paint his grandfather, Henry the Seventh, in an amiable light."—History of England, vol. 1.

Rushworth remarks, that "His decrees were generally made with so much equity, that, though gifts rendered him suspected for injustice, yet never any decree made by him was reversed as unjust."—Collections, vol. 1.

The Chancellor made an earnest defence, both when first accused and after sentence. When first suspected, he confidently declares his innocence in a letter to Buckingham:

"Your Lordship spoke of Purgatory. I am now in it. But my mind is in a calm; for my fortune is my felicity. I know I have clean hands and a clean heart; and, I hope, a clean house for friends or servants. But Job himself, or whoever was the justest Judge, by such hunting for matters against him, as hath been used against me, may for a time seem foul, especially in a time when greatness is the mark, and accusation is the game."

This indignant defence compares strangely with his after confession, and with his letter to the Lords before his formal and detailed acknowledgment. He remarks, that understanding some justification was expected from him, he had "Chosen one only justification instead of all others; for after the clear submission and confession which he should then make to their Lordships, he hoped he might say, and justify with Job in these words, I have not hid my sin as did Adam, nor concealed my fault in my bosom."

Not only so, but when he resigned the seals, he accompanied the act with the pathetic exclamation: "Rex dedit, culpa abstulit!" that is, "The King gave, and my own faults have taken away!"

Yet Mr. Montagu, with charming naïveté, asks us to believe that Bacon was innocent; that he could have proved his entire innocence; but was generously willing to sacrifice himself at the command of the King and the favourite. Like the Roman of old, he determined to close the "great gulf fixed" between the throne and the Parliament, by self-immolation. Mr. Montagu is grave; therefore, we presume, serious. We have seen that he defends Bacon's prosecution of Essex by that rule of legal morality which makes the advocate abjure every consideration which may interfere with his official character. He now makes Bacon utter the grossest falsehoods, and expose himself to the merited condemnation of the world for judicial corruption, in order to gratify his King and please the King's favourite. First, he sacrifices his friend to his court brief, and then immolates himself to his King's whim. Verily, the golden rule itself is but selfishness compared to such abnegation! Damon and Pythias will fade in story, and the Suttie pyre hardly arrest the attention of the passing stranger!

Addison, after stating that he would "show that all the Byron who have earned a more than ordinary genius in their writings, and were the glory of their times, were men whose hopes were filled with immortality, and the prospect of future rewards, and men who lived in a dutiful submission to all the doctrines of revealed religion,"— goes on to remark:

"I shall in this paper only instance Mr Francis Bacon, a man who, for greatness of genius, and compass of knowledge, did honour to his age and country. I could almost say to human nature itself. He possessed at once all those extraordinary talents which were divided amongst the greatest authors of antiquity. He had the sound, distinct, comprehensive knowledge of Aristotle, with all the beautiful lights, grace, and embellishments of Cicero. One does not know which to admire most in his writings, the strength of reason, force of style, or brightness of imagination."—Fisher, No. 307

Shoefield, Duke of Buckinghamshire, asserts that "All his works are, for expression, as well as thought, the glory of our nation and of all later ages."

Condé de Gondamar wrote him a letter on his fall, in which he assures him of the King of Spain's interposition, if he judged it any way convenient for the restoring of his condition.—Shepherd's Collection.

Lord Cavendish, afterwards Earl of Devonshire, received a letter from Italy, in which it was stated that "Lord Bacon was more and more known, and his books more and more delighted in, so that those men who had more than ordinary knowledge in human studies, esteemed him one of the most capable spirits of that age."

M. Voiture writes

"I saw every thing perfectly true that you have said me of Bacon, but do you not think that Horace, who said, 'Vixit Britanni inscriptione fusa,' would be much more astonished to hear a barbarian talk in this manner, and to see that there is not perhaps at this day a Roman who speaks so good Latin as this Englishman! And would not Jerome say, with greater reason than ever, 'Nunc totius Græcæ contritus habet verba Athenæus?'"

This compliment of M. Voiture will perhaps recall to some of our readers the epigram with which the learned Grotius honoured John Barclay's classical erudition: it will be found under his portrait prefixed to the "Argenis."

"Gusto Cædralus, Gallus metalibus, hic est Romanus Romano qui dant ore loqui."

'A Scot by blood—and French by birth—this man

At Rome speaks Latin as so Roman can.'

Grotius speaks most favourably also of Bacon's Life of Henry VII., and the learned Covarrigius fully agrees with this opinion.

Baron Puffendorf commends him in the most exalted terms:

"The late most wise Chancellor of England was the chief writer of our age, and carried as it were the standard that we might prom forward, and make greater discoveries in Philosophical matters, than any of which hitherto our schools had rung. So that if in our time any great improvements have been made in Philosophy, there has been not a little owing to that great man."—Apianus Continuus, cap. 1.

Puffendorf's representation of Bacon as a "standard-bearer," instantly reminds us of the philosopher's own modest and beautiful comparison. In a letter to the Earl of Salisbury, he remarks that in his book he was "contented to awake better spirits, being himself like a bell-ringer, who is first up to call others to church." To carry on the epistolical simile, as Aristotle has been called the Pope of Philosophy until "a greater arose in his place," we may compare Bacon, not to the bell-ringer in the steeple, but to the Luther in the pulpit, who questioned his infallibility, and struck a fatal blow at the supremacy of that school which "made nothing perfect," though the bringing in of a better system did.

Francis Bacon styles Bacon a

"New light to Philosophy, one who first united speculation and action, and opened a passage to those mighty discoveries that have been made since his time."—Compendium Historiæ Philosophiæ.

Voltaire calls him

"The father of experimental philosophy, owing that what surprised him most was to find the Doctrine of Atomism, which is looked upon to be the foundation of another philosophy, asserted, in words not to be controverted any, good-natured, and naturally just, to be based by domestic harpists, who, in effect, and he had given way to into to subject among the masters in Chancery as to have been the cause of that virulence of fault. This betrayed him to so in his servants, who made a corrupt use of all those riches and honours which a caped upon him."—Fisher, No. 307

Johnson of monstrum in modo. But

William, "who is acknowledged not to have been prejudiced against the chancellor," speaks in a very different strain:

"He was the true emblem of human folly, being more than a man to come things, and less than a woman to others. His crimes were luxury and avarice; and these he had often committed others to as a judge, which now he came to suffer by as a delinquent. And they were proved and approved against him with so many circumstantialities, that they did very truly upon him, both to relation to his reputation of them, and his expiating of them."—Rowley's History of England.

It may be pertinent to remark here that Buckingham's displeasure at the manner in which Williams received his suggestions relative to depending cases in the Court of Chancery, given reason to fear that the premeditated Lord Keeper was more compliant.—Bacon's Letters, by Birch; Bacon's Life of Archbishop Williams.

Hume remarks that

"Bacon was a man universally admired for the greatness of his genius, and beloved for the sweetness and humanity of his behaviour. He was the great ornament of his age and nation; and sought to render him the ornament of human nature itself, but that strength of mind which might check his impetuous desire of perfection, that could not yielding to his dignity, and restrain his profuse inclination to acquire, that could be requisite neither for his honour nor entertainment."—History of Great Britain.

"The great glory of literature to this island, during the reign of James, was Mr Lord Bacon. Most of his performances were composed in Latin, though he possessed neither the elegance of that, nor of his native tongue. If we consider the variety of talents displayed by this man—as a poet, a scholar, a man of business, a wit, a courtier, a companion, an author, a philosopher—he is justly the object of great admiration. If we consider him merely as an author and philosopher, the light in which we view him at present, though very estimable, he was yet inferior to his contemporary, Galileo, perhaps even to Kepler. Bacon pointed out a different road to true philosophy. Galileo both pointed it out to others, and made himself considerable advances in it."—Ibid.

Upon which we have in the British Biography:

"Galileo was undoubtedly an Italian man, and Kepler an admirable astronomer; but though we admit their superiority in astronomy, mathematics, and some particular branches of physical knowledge, it does by no means follow that either of them was greater philosopher than Bacon. The praise of Bacon is founded not upon his skill in this or that particular branch of knowledge, but on his great and comprehensive understanding, which led to almost the whole extent of universal nature. And he was so little indebted to the partiality of his countrymen, that his writings appear, for some time at least, to have been more esteemed and admired in foreign countries than in England."

His eminent French disciple, D'Alembert, by whom many of his writings were more widely introduced to the French than they had been previously, cannot sufficiently commend our author:

"On considering attentively the sound, intelligent, and extensive views of this great man, the multiplicity of objects his penetrating wit had comprehended within its sphere, the elevation of his style, that every where makes the boldest images to combine with the most vigorous reasoning, we should be tempted to esteem him as the greatest, the most universal, and the most eloquent of philosophers. His works are justly valued, perhaps more valued than known, and therefore, more deserving of our study than eulogium."—Enc. Sup. vol. xvi., see the whole of this article.

We consider Mr. Hume to be sufficiently punished. He was the last man in which Bacon, who has displayed as little of the spirit of the true philosopher himself. His theory of evidence would never have been allowed to expose his folly to the world, had he understood even the Compromise and intellectual incoherence of Bacon. Bacon's genius was indeed comprehensive. Sir John Hawkins states that "Lord Bacon, in his natural history, has given a great variety of experiments touching music, that show him to have been not only a philosopher an enquirer into the phenomena of sound, but a master of the science of harmony, and very intimately acquainted with the secrets of musical composition."

Sir John quotes the following remark of Lord Bacon as a proof of his knowledge of the sciences:

"The greatest and best harmony is when every part or instrument is not heard by itself, but a combination of them all, which requires to stand some distance off, even as it is in the mixture of perfume, or the taking the smells of several flowers in the air."—History of Hume. The above authorities, quoted from the Biographia Britannica, should be read at length.

His chaplain tells us that our great philosopher pursued the true plan of acquiring general knowledge: "He would light his torch at every man's candle." We have referred to the graphic picture which Olearius gives us of his penetrating Lord Middleton at the council-table by his minute knowledge of manufactures and the rules of trade. Olearius further tells us:

"I have heard him entertain a country lord in the proper terms relating to hawks and dogs; and at another time entertain a London citizen."

Pope refers to the precision of Bacon's language:

"Words that were Bacon or gave Raleigh space."

An English dictionary, Mr. Ford remarks, might be composed from his works; but this compliment is very indefinite, and not one, we think, which Bacon would have coveted. Duguid Stewart remarks, in reference to Bacon's design of classifying the multifarious objects of human knowledge:

"Nor must it be forgotten, to the glory of his genius, that what he failed to accomplish remains to this day a desideratum in science: that the intellectual chart delineated by him is, with all its imperfections, the only one of which modern philosophy has yet to boast; and that the united talents of D'Alembert and Diderot, aided by all the lights of the eighteenth century, have been able to add but little to what Bacon performed."—1st Prof. Disc. to Enyc. Brit.

"At the time when Bacon wrote, it might truly be said, that a small portion, even of the learned ages, and of the abilities of learned men, had been dedicated to the study of natural philosophy. This served, in his opinion, to account for the imperfect state in which he found human knowledge in general; for he thought it certain that no part of knowledge could attain much excellence without having its foundation laid in physical sciences."—PROF. PLAYFAIR: 3d Prof. Disc. to Enyc. Brit.

Professor Playfair further remarks, after an analysis of a portion of the Novum Organum, the second part of the Instauratio of the Sciences:

"The power and compass of a mind which could form such a plan beforehand, and trace not merely the outline, but many of the most minute ramifications of sciences which did not yet exist, must be an object of admiration to all succeeding ages."—Ibid.

"We must constantly remember that the philosophy of Bacon was left exceedingly incomplete. Many lives would not have sufficed for what he had planned, and he gave only the æres subjective of his own. It is evident that he had turned his thoughts to physical philosophy, rather than an exercise of his reasoning faculties, than from any peculiar aptitude for their subjects, much less any advantage of opportunity for their cultivation. He was more eminently the philosopher of human than of general nature. . . . Burke, perhaps, comes, of all modern writers, the nearest to him; but though Bacon may not be more profound than Burke, he is still more comprehensive."—HALLAM: Introduc. to Hist. Lit.

After this "cloud of witnesses" to the surpassing merits of our great philosopher, let us revert to the opinions of some of his contemporaries. "The Queen did acknowledge," says the Earl of Essex in a letter to Bacon himself, "you had a great wit, and an excellent gift of speech, and much other good learning. But in law, she rather thought you could make shew to the utmost of your knowledge, than that you were deep."

"If it be asked, says Dr. Hurd, how the Queen came to form this conclusion, the answer is plain. It was from Mr. Bacon's having a great wit, an excellent gift of speech, and much other good learning."—Hurd's Dialogues.

But Mr. Stewart opposes to Queen Elizabeth's judgment on the law item that of Mr. Hargrave:

"What might we not have expected from the hands of such a master, if his vast mind had not so embraced within its compass the whole field of science, as very much to detach him from professional studies?"

Of the exact sciences, Bacon was by no means a master; he neither knew, nor cared to know, much of the Mathematics. He underrated the value of this instrumentality, undoubtedly. Hobbes was an intimate of Bacon, and, we presume, supplied Aubrey with the pleasing information he communicates, that, "in short, all that were great and good loved and honoured him."

Let us not forget the commendation of our great favourite, quaint Thomas Fuller:

"He fell into a dislike of Aristotle's Philosophy as barren and jejune, enabling some to dispute, more to mangle, few to find out truth, and none, if confining themselves to his principles. Hence it was that afterwards he traded so largely in experiments; so that, as Socrates is said to be the first who stooped to towering speculations into practical morality, Sir Francis was one of the first who reduced notional to real and scientific philosophy. . . . His abilities were a clear confutation of two vulgar errors. (1) Beliefs on learned men: first, that judgment, wit, fancy, and memory cannot conveniently be in conjunction in the same person; whereas our knight was a rich cabinet, filled with all four, besides a golden key to open it.—Elocution. Secondly, 'That he who is something in all, is nothing in any one art:' whereas he was singular in scientia, and, being in-at-all, came off with credit. Such who condemn him for pride, if in his place, with the fifth part of his parts, had been ten times prouder themselves. . . . He may be said to have left nothing to his executors, and all to his heirs, under which notion the learned of all ages may be held."—Worthies.

"Bacon, when like himself—for no man was ever more inconsistent—says, Prudent questio—dimidum scientie est."—COLLIER: Tab. Talk.

"When I look at the mind of Lord Bacon, it seems vast, original, penetrating, analogical, beyond all competition. When I look at his character, it is wavering, shuffling, mean. In the closing scene, and in that only, he appears in true dignity, as a man of profound conviction."—Cecil's Remains.

"Lord Bacon was the greatest genius that England, or perhaps any other country, ever produced."—Pope: Spence's Anecdotes.

"In his Novum Organum he has laid down the whole method that Descartes afterwards followed."—Lord BOLINGBROKE: SPEECH.

It is no little satisfaction to observe that the melancholy fall of this great man seems to have excited but little attention in foreign countries: where known, doubtless in many cases it was attributed to political prejudices, or the effects of that envy and malignity which, as Bacon himself phrases it, makes "greatness the mark, and accusation the game."

Bayle, one of the most inquisitive and gossiping of encyclopedists, seems to be ignorant of any criminal charges against the ex-chancellor. His name was in high renown on the continent, and "eminent foreigners crossed the seas on purpose to see and discourse with him." When the Marquis D'Effrat, who caused his Essays to be translated into English, escorted Henrietta Maria, the Queen of Charles I., to England, he visited Bacon, and was received by his Lordship, who was confined to his bed by sickness, with the curtains drawn: "You resemble the angels," remarked the Marquis: "we hear those beings constantly talked of, we believe them superior to mankind, and we never have the consolation to see them." His lordship replied that, "If the charity of others compared him to an angel, his own infirmities told him he was a man."

—Stephen's Account of Lord Bacon's Life. The Marquis returned home, bearing the philosopher's picture with him, corresponding with him ever after, and esteemed it a peculiar honour to be styled, by his illustrious friend, his son.

We have referred to that memorable dinner at York House, when the Lord Chancellor, with a chosen party of distinguished friends, "celebrated his entrance into his sixtieth year." We shall quote Ben Jonson's poem (a specimen of which we have already given) on this interesting, we may say august, occasion. As few of our readers have the opportunity of seeing the lines in their original dress, we shall retain the antiquated orthography of the day. The form of the poem "Implies a very beautiful fiction; the poet starting, as it were, on his entering York House, at the sight of the Genius of the place performing some mystery, which, penetrating from the gaiety of his look, affords matter for the compliment."

Lord Bacon's Sixty Day.

"Hail, happy Genius of this ancient pile!
How comes it all things so about thee smile?
The fire, the wine, the men, and in the midst
Thou stand'st, as if some mystery thou did'st!
Pardon, I read it in thy face, the day
For whose returns, and many, all these pray:
And so doe I. This is the sixtieth year,
Since Bacon, and thy Lord, was borne and here;
Son to the grave, wise Keeper of the Seale,
Fame and foundation of the English weale:
What then his father was, that since is he,
Now with a title more to the degree.
England's High Chancellor! the destined heire
In his soft cradle to his father's chair;
Whose even thred the Fates spinne round and full,
Out of their choicest and their whitest wooll.
'Tis a brave cause of joy; let it be knowne.
For 'twere a narrow gladnesse, kept thine owne.
Give me a deeper-crowned bowle, that I may sing,
In saying him, the wysdome of my King."

"Verly every man at his best estate is altogether vanity!" Well was it said by the sage of old—"Call no man happy while he lives!" Even then, on that high festal day, the handwriting was on the wall, the decree had gone forth—"Thy glory hath departed from thee!" A few weeks more, and he who so proudly entertained the chief estates of the realm on his natal day—the man whom the king delighted to honour, the first statesman of his court, and the most illustrious philosopher of his age—bowed his head in agony, and in deepest humiliation uttered the touching prayer: "I beseech your Lordships be merciful to a broken reed!"

Let us trust that he proved that "sweet are the uses of adversity!" That in his hour of darkness he could exclaim with the Royal Psalmist, who also "passed through the deep waters!"

"Bonum mihi quis humiliasti me: ut discam justificationes tuas!"

That affliction was thus profitable to him, we have good ground for believing. In that solemn and affecting prayer with which he turned unto the Lord his God, we have evidence of unfeigned humiliation and heartfelt devotion. Mr. Addison quotes this in the Tatler, with some most appropriate prefatory remarks:

"I was infinitely pleased to find among the works of this extraordinary man a prayer of his own composing, which, for the elevation of thought, and greatness of expression, seems rather the devotion of an angel than a man. . . . In this prayer, at the same time that we find him prostrating himself before the great mercies, and troubled under afflictions which at that time lay heavy upon him, we see him supported by the sense of his integrity, his zeal, his devotion, and his love to mankind; which give him a much higher figure in the minds of thinking men, than that greatness had done from which he had fallen. I shall beg leave to write down the prayer itself, with the title with it, as it was found amongst his lordship's papers, written in his own hand; not being able to furnish my readers with an entertainment more suitable to this solemn time."—Tatler, 287, December 23, 1710.

A Prayer, or Psalm, made by my Lord Bacon, Chancellor of England.

"Most gracious Lord God, my merciful Father from my youth up! My Creator, my Redeemer, my Comforter! Thou, O Lord, soundest and searchest the depths and secrets of all hearts; thou acknowledgest the upright of heart; thou judgest the hypocrite; thou ponderest men's thoughts and doings as in a balance; thou measurest their intentions as with a line; vanity and crooked ways cannot be hid from thee.

"Remember, O Lord! how thy servant hath walked before thee; remember what I have first sought, and what hath been principal in my intentions. I have loved thy assemblies, I have mourned for the divisions of thy church, I have delighted in the brightness of thy sanctuary. This vine, which thy right hand hath planted in this nation, I have ever prayed unto thee that it might have the first and the latter rain, and that it might stretch her branches to the seas and to the floods. The state and bread of the poor and oppressed have been precious in mine eyes; I have hated all cruelty and hardness of heart; I have, though in a deep-seated weed, procured the good of all men. If any have been my enemies, I thought not of them, neither hath the sun almost set upon my displeasure; but I have been, as a dove, free from superfluity of malice. Thy creatures have been my books, but thy Scriptures much more. I have sought thee in the courts, fields, and gardens; but I have found thee in thy temples.

"Thousands have been my sins, and ten thousands my transgressions, but thy sanctifications have remained with me, and my heart, through thy grace, hath been an unquenched coal upon thine altar.

"O Lord, my strength! I have since my youth met with thee in all my ways, by thy fatherly compassions, by thy comfortable chastisements, and by thy most visible providence. As thy favours have increased upon me, so have thy corrections; so as thou hast been always near me, O Lord! and ever as my worldly blessings were exalted, so secret darts from thee have pierced me; and when I have ascended before men, I have descended in humiliation before thee. And now, when I thought most of peace and honour, thy hand is heavy upon me, and hath humbled me according to thy former loving-kindness, keeping me still in thy fatherly school, not as a bastard, but as a child. Just are thy judgments upon me for my sins, which are more in number than the sands of the sea, but have no proportion to thy mercies; for what are the sands of the sea? Earth, heavens, and all these are nothing to thy mercies. Besides my innumerable sins, I confess before thee, that I am debtor to thee for the gracious talent of thy gifts and graces, which I have neither put into a napkin, nor put it, as I ought, to exchangers, where it might have made best profit, but mispent it in things for which I was least fit: so I may truly say, my soul hath been a stranger in the course of my pilgrimage. Be merciful unto me, O Lord, for my Saviour's sake, and receive me unto thy bosom, or guide me in thy ways."

When we admire the vast plans of this great architect, and contrast the magnificent design with the comparatively meagre performance, and then remember that the allurements of ambition, and the seductions of pleasure, were sufficiently strong to tempt from his work the wise master-builder, we feel as we should on beholding the gigantic but unfinished proportions of the castle of some Titan, who had left his labour to chase a butterfly, or, in some flowery grove, had wasted the noontide in inglorious repose.

Bacon, Nathaniel, grandson of Lord Keeper Bacon, has had attributed to him the authorship of An Historical Discourse of Uniformity of the Government of England, 1647-1652. Reprinted in 1672, and in 1682. The publisher was prosecuted and outlawed. The Earl of Chatham, in his letters to his nephew, praises this work highly.

Bacon, Sir Nicholas, 1510-1579, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal in the reign of Elizabeth, father of Francis Bacon, the illustrious philosopher, was educated at Bene't (now Corpus Christi) College, Cambridge. His biography belongs to political, rather than to literary, history. A number of his Speeches are preserved in Collections of MSS., of which Bishop Tanner gives a list. Holinshed ranks him with those who have written something concerning the History of England. Mr. Masters refers to a commentary by Sir Nicholas upon the 12 Minor Prophets. In 1723 was pub. his Right of Succession in the Stuarts, exclusive of Mary Queen of Scots, defended against Sir Anthony Brown.

Bacon, Robert, 1168?-1248, an eminent English divine, studied at Oxford, where he subsequently read divinity lectures. Dr. Pegge thinks that he was either elder brother, or uncle, of Roger Bacon. The latter is the conjecture of Leland also. He wrote, 1. Glosses on the Holy Scripture. 2. On the Psalter. 3. Discourses. 4. Lectures. Pits, Leland, Hearne, Cave, and other authors, have confounded this Robert Bacon with Roger.

Bacon, Robt. Miscell. Pieces in Verse, Lon., 1790.

Bacon, Bakon or Bacun, Roger, 1214-1292, an English monk of the order of St. Francis, was born near Ilchester, in Somersetshire. Although living in the century in which a number of great names occur—Thomas Aquinas, Alexander Hales, Albertus Magnus, Bonaventura, &c.—yet he is certainly second to none, and perhaps deserves to be ranked first. After studying at Oxford, Bacon sought the advantages offered by the University of Paris, then the resort of all desirous of perfecting their education. Here he formed that intimacy with Robert Grosseteste, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, which proved of such service to him in the prosecution of those studies to which he devoted his life. Pegge and Chalmers deny this intimacy. He was also largely indebted to the patronage of Edmund Price Archbishop of Canterbury, William Shirwood, Chancellor of Lincoln, and Richard Fishacre, a celebrated teacher of the sciences. At Paris he took the degree of doctor of theology, after which, whether in France or England is not known, he assumed the monastic habit of the Franciscans. Returning to England, he settled at Oxford, where he is supposed to have made his principal experiments in natural philosophy and other branches of science and speculation. It is not a little remarkable that he perceived and deplored the insufficiency of that system of philosophy which his illustrious namesake, about four hundred years subsequently, so successfully attacked: referring to the inadequacy of Aristotle's canons to answer the difficulties to which they are applied, he remarks:

"Si habere potestatem super libros Aristotelis, ego facerem omnes cremari: quia non est nisi temporis amissio studere in illis, et causa erroris et multiplicatio ignorantie ultra id quod valet explicari."

According to Dr. Hutton, who drew his knowledge "from some scarce books," he expended in twenty years' researches some £2000, a very large sum for the time, supplied by some of the heads of the Universities. His proficiency in learning was wonderful. He is said to have been a perfect master of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and to have added thereto a knowledge of the Arabic tongue. He was profoundly versed in metaphysics, theology, grammar, astronomy, chemistry, mechanics, logic, chronology, optics, magic, and other departments of learning. He made many extraordinary machines, and was so noted for this skill as to have the reputation of a magician. He has the credit of having invented the air-pump, the camera obscura, the diving-bell, and gunpowder. Some passages from his works have been cited as a proof of his having invented gunpowder:

"In omnem distantiam, quam volumus, possumus artificialiter componere ignem comburentem ex sale petre et alia. . . . Sed tamen salis petre lurum mox ex ure et sulphuris: et sic facies tonitruum et coruscationem, si scies artificium."—Ep. de Secretis Operibus Artis et Naturæ.

Bacon is one of a number of learned men to whom the vulgar imputed the manufacture of a brazen head which possessed the faculty of speech. His patron, Robert Grosseteste, Pope Sylvester II., and Albertus Magnus, all had the credit, or discredit, of having formed by magic a wonderful head of this character. Though indeed the latter, not satisfied with a head only, made a man complete, who "not only answered questions very readily and truly when demanded," but became so loquacious as to interrupt the studies of Thomas Aquinas; "he was so flippant with his brazen tongue, that Thomas Aquinas, a reserved and contemplative person, and pupil at that time to Albertus Magnus, knocked the idol to pieces to stop its talking!" Methinks we see our reader smile; perhaps he is incredulous; but these were very wise men, the magicians of the 12th and 13th centuries! As to Friar Bacon's brazen head, we find in Rose's Biog. Dict., "an abridged version of the legend from a rare tract, entitled The Farmer's Historie of Friar Bacon, 4to, Lon., 1652. Friar Bacon, it is pretended, discovered after great study, that if he could succeed in making a head of brass which should speak, and hear it when it spoke, he might be able to surround all England with a wall of brass. By the assistance of Friar Bungey, and a devil, likewise called into the consultation, he accomplished his object, but with this drawback—the head when finished was warranted to speak in the course of one month, but it was quite uncertain when; and if they heard it not before it had done speaking, all their labour would be lost. After watching for three weeks, fatigue got the mastery over them, and Bacon set his man Miles to watch, with strict injunctions to awake them if the head should speak. The fellow heard the head at the end of one half-hour say, 'Time is!' at the end of another, 'Time was!' and at the end of another half-hour, 'Time's past!' when down it fell with a tremendous crash, the blockhead of a servant thinking that his master would be angry if he disturbed him for such trifles! We cannot conclude better than in the words of the excellent Robert Recorde—"And hereof came it that fryer Bakon was accompted so greute a negromancier, which never used that arte, (by any conjuncture that I can fynde), but was in geometrie and other mathematicall sciences so experte, that he could doe by them suche thynges as were wonderful in the sight of most people."—Pathway to Knowledge, 4to, Lon., 1551." A lengthened account of Bacon's experiments and discoveries in the sciences, &c. does not, of course, come under the head of literary history. We refer the reader to the Biog. Brit., Rose's Biog. Dict., Cunningham's Biog. History, &c., and earlier accounts. His writings were very numerous. Leland complains that Bacon's MSS. were so dispersed, that it would be easier to collect the leaves of the Sybil than the very names of the treatises he wrote. He gives the titles of 30. Bale collected the titles of more than 80.

Pits brings the number up to nearly one hundred; and Dr. Jebb classifies them, (see Table in Biog. Brit.,) making in Grammar, 5; Mathematics, Physics, &c., 23; Optics, 10; Geography, 6; Astronomy, 7; Chronology, 1; Chemistry, 9; Magic, 5; Physic, 9; Theology, 6; Logic, Metaphysics, and Ethics, 8; Philology and Miscellany, 12. The Opus Majus was published by Dr. Jebb in London, in 1733, and repub. at Venice, 1750. Speculum Alchemie Norib., 1541. De Mirabili Potestate Artis et Naturæ, &c., 1542. In French, Paris, 1612. Trad. par J. Girard. In English, Lon., 1659. Another trans. under the title, Discovery of the Miracles of Art, Nature, and Magic, Lon., 1657, by T. M. His Chemical tracts will be found in the Thesaurus Chemicus, 8vo, Frankf., 1603. The treatise on the means of avoiding the infirmities of old age was first printed at Oxford in 1590. In this treatise he expatiates upon secret and mysterious medicines. Dr. Richard Brown repub. this work under the title of The Care of Old Age and the Preservation of Youth. Many of his MSS. are unpublished. Computus Rogeri Baconis; Compendium Theologicum, and Liber Naturalium, are in the King's Library. Opus Minus and Opus Tertium are in the Cottonian Library.—See Lists of his Works in Biog. Brit., and in Watts Bib. Brit. The monks of his order accused him of converse with evil spirits, which caused the Pope to have him imprisoned, but he was released by the successor to the papal chair, Clement IV., by whose encouragement he wrote his Opus Majus.

Dr. Freind considers that since the days of Archimedes the world had seen no greater genius than Roger Bacon. We shall institute no comparison between Roger and his celebrated namesake, the Lord Chancellor. In point of erudition, Roger far surpasses the latter. Gerard Joannes Vossius gives Roger no meagre praise:

"In the year 1270 flourished in every kind of learning among the English, Roger Bacon, a Monk of the Franciscan order, and an Oxford Divine, a man of such vast learning, that England, nay the whole world beside, had not in this respect his equal, or his second; yet either through the envy or the ignorance of the age in which he lived, he was stigmatised as a magician."—De Natura Artium.

"The mind of Roger Bacon was strangely compounded of almost prophetic gleams of the future course of science, and the best principles of the inductive philosophy, with a more than usual credulity in the superstition of his own times."—HALLAM: Lit. of Europe. Baconthorp, Bacondorp or Bacon, John, d. 1346, was born at Baconthorp, a village in Norfolk. He studied first at Oxford, then at Paris. He was called "The Resolute Doctor." Several of his works have been published: Commentaria seu Questiones per quatuor Libros Sententiarum, Mediol., 1510. Six editions. Compendium Legis Christi, et Quodlibeta, Venice, 1527. Philosophia, Aug. Taur., 1667, 3 vols. 4to. A Catalogue of his writings will be found in Leland, Bale, and Pits. Baconthorp was the head of the followers of the philosopher Averroes. Being remarkable for smallness of stature, Pits and Fuller make themselves merry therewith:

"Erat quidem, ut alter Zacheus, statura pusillus, sed ingenio magnus, ut mirum sit in tam exili corpore tanto habuisse virtutes, et naturam in tantillo hominone tam sublime collocasse ingenium. Tam ingentia scripsit volumina, ut corpus non tulisset quod ingenium protulerat. Nam si moles librorum ejus, composita fascina, auctoribus humeris imposita fuisset, homulum, sine dubio comprimeret suffocasset."

"He was, like another Zacheus, a very dwarf in stature, but of so great a genius, that it is surprising such exalted virtues should dwell in so small a body, and that nature should have placed so sublime a wit in such an epitome of a man. He wrote such large volumes, that his body could not have sustained the product of his mind. For if the weight of his books, bundled together, had been laid upon their author's shoulder, the little man must undoubtedly have sunk under it."—Pits De illis. Angl. Scriptor., in Biog. Brit.

Fuller, who is so ready in making occasion for a witticism, of course avails himself of so fair an opportunity as the little Resolute Doctor gives him.

"First, for the dwarfishness of his stature,

'Scapellum calami stramentum charta libellus.'

His pen-knife, pen, ink-horn, one sheet of paper, and any of his books, would amount to his full height. As for all the books of his own making, put together, their burden were more than his body could bear. Secondly, for his high spirit in his low body. Indeed his soul had but a small diocese to visit, and therefore might the better attend the effectual informing thereof. . . . He groped after more light than he saw, saw more than he durst speak of, spoke of more than he was thanked for by those of his superstitious order, [English Carmelites,] amongst whom, (saith Bale,) neither before nor after, arose the like for learning and religion."—Worthies.

Badcock, R. Horticult. Con. to Phil. Trans., 1746.

Badcock, Rev. Saml., 1747–1788, a dissenting minister, took orders in the Church of England in 1787, when he became curate of Broad Clyst. He was an able contributor to The London Review, London Magazine, General Evening Post, St. James Chronicle, and to The Monthly Review. In the last-named periodical, he published a review (June and August, 1783) of Dr. Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity; it was wittily remarked of this review, that no one save Dr. Priestley would wish it to be shorter. The Doctor took his critique so much to heart, that in less than a month he published in pamphlet form A Reply to the Animadversions, &c. in The Monthly Review for June, 1783, &c. This was answered in the September number of the Review. The principal point at issue was the Doctrine of the Primitive Church concerning the Person of Christ. This review "was generally admitted to be a most triumphant refutation of Dr. Priestley's opinions, as well as one of the most elaborate specimens of criticism that modern times had furnished." Another writer remarks, "Badcock continued his assault, sparing neither the history nor the Defence; and, in the view of many, demolished the system he had assailed." He pub. some memoirs of the Wesley family, which led to some controversy with the excellent John Wesley. See Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, vol. v.

"Mr. Badcock was one of the most distinguished literary men of his day. His judgment was singularly acute and comprehensive; his learning profound and various; his genius fertile and lively, but regulated by a most exquisite taste."—Cunningham's Biog. History.

Mr. Nichols introduced Mr. Badcock to Dr. Johnson, and the following letter from Mr. B. to Mr. N., referring to Dr. Johnson's opinion of Priestley, is not without interest:

"How much I am obliged to you for the favour you did me in introducing me to Dr. Johnson! Tantum vidi Virginium. But to have seen him, and to have received a testimony of respect from him, was enough. I recollect all the conversation, and shall never forget one of his expressions. Speaking of Dr. Priestley, (whose writings, I saw, he estimated at a low rate,) he said, 'You have proved him as deficient in probity as he is in learning.' I called him an 'Under Scholar;' but he was not willing to allow him a claim even to that merit. He said 'that he borrowed from those who had been borrowers themselves, and did not know that the mistakes he adopted had been answered by others.' I often think of our short, but precious, visit to this great man. I shall consider it as a sort of an era in my life."

"Which is chiefly remarkable as being the first on record in which a method is laid down for determining the longitude at sea, by an observation of the heavenly bodies."

He also wrote an account of his voyage under Robert Bylot in 1615. His name will ever be remembered by the Bay discovered by him, in a voyage made under Bylot in 1616.

Bage, Robert, 1728–1801, a novelist of considerable talent, whose memory has been honoured by having Sir

Walter Scott as his biographer, wrote Mount Heneth, pub. 1781; Burnham Downe, the Fair Syrian, and James Wallace. William Hutton gives some particulars of him in his "Life."

"Mount Heneth became justly popular, from the vivacity of its style and dialogue, and the many well-drawn characters, and apposite reflections on questions of morality and humanity. . . . All his novels were favourably received by the public, as far superior to the common run of novels."—Chalmers's Biog. Dict.

Bagford, John, 1650?–1716, an enthusiastic collector of literary curiosities, was bred to the occupation of a shoemaker, but did not acknowledge the obligation of the old maxim, "Ne sutor ultra crepidam;" but even Apelles, however, would not have desired to restrain the zeal of this useful and amiable lover of antiquities. He became extensively acquainted with old books, prints, and coins, and possessed no slight knowledge of the Roman remains in Britain. Of this there is ample evidence in his curious letter to Hearne, in the 1st vol. of 2d edition of Leland's Collectanea. He did not confine his researches to the book-stalls and shops of London, but travelled abroad for book-sellers and literary gentlemen, enriching their shelves and libraries with his acquisitions. In this way he was a sort of humble Dibdin to the Spensers and Hebers of his time. His private collection of books, title-pages, covers, &c. was very large. As must always be the case with a man whose education has been picked up item by item, without system, he sometimes displays amusing ignorance in conjunction with his knowledge. He projected a history of his favourite art, and, in 1707 published in the Philosophical Transactions, his "Proposals for a History of Printing, Printers, Illuminators, Chalcography, Paper Making, &c.," price to be £1 for a book of 800 pages. He seems to have lacked encouragement, as the book never appeared. After his death, Lord Oxford purchased his collections and papers for his library. They are now in the Harleian Collection in the British Museum, in 42 folio volumes: but a melancholy sight a portion of them present; for, as Dibdin remarks,

"A modern collector and lover of perfect copies will witness, with shuddering, among Bagford's immense collection of title-pages, the frontispieces of the Complutensian Polyglot, and Chauncy's History of Hertfordshire, torn out to illustrate a History of Printing."

He was employed as a collector by Lord Oxford, Dr. John Moore, Bishop of Ely, Sir Hans Sloane, Sir James Austin, and others. Mr. Bagford was one of the many ingenious men in the world whose natural talents are continually hampered for want of early education. See interesting accounts of him in Dibdin's Bibliomania, in Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, and Hearne's prefaces to Guil. Roper Vita, D. Thomæ Mori, 1716, and to Walter Hemingford's history. "At vero in hoc genera fragmenta colligendi omnes quidem alios quantum ego existimare possum facile superavit JOANUS BAGFORDIUS, de quo apud Hemingum, &c." We quote a line or so from the Heming Wigornensis Chartularium, to which reference is made.

"Had his education been equal to his natural genius, he would have proved a much greater man than he was. And yet, without this education, he was certainly the greatest man in the world in his way."—Dibdin's Bibliomania.

Bagot, Lewis, 1740–1802, was successively Bishop of Bristol, Norwich, and St. Asaph. He was educated at Westminster School, and chosen thence student of Christ Church. He pub. a number of theological works, 1772–1790, the principal of which is Twelve Discourses on the Prophecies concerning the first Establishment and subsequent History of Christianity, preached at the Warburtonian Lecture, in Lincoln's Inn Chapel, 1780.

"Bishop Bagot opened his lectures by preliminary observations on the nature and value of the evidences drawn from prophecies; including some pointed remarks on Lord Monboddo and Mr. Gibbon. The subject of his subsequent discourses were, the promise of a second dispensation under the first; the progressive nature of the kingdom of God; the distinctive characters of the Messiah, and the nature of his kingdom; the time limited by the prophets, and the proofs of its fulfilment; the conformity of the life of Christ and of his kingdom to the predictions; the prophecies concerning the latter times; and the general recapitulation of the whole subject."—British Critic, vol. xvii. p. 653.

Dr. Bagot has been commended as a man of great learning, and of the most gentle and amiable manners.

Bagshaw, Edward, 1604–1662, of Brasenose Coll., Oxf., a lawyer who at first opposed the cause of Charles I., but subsequently became one of his adherents, published a number of theological and political works, 1633–1662. Whilst imprisoned by the Parliament, he wrote a treatise which does not argue much respect for the opinion of his judges, viz.: The Rights of the Crown to England, as it is established by Law. This he published very appropriately in 1660—the year of the Restoration. The earliest of his publications was the Life and Death of Mr. Robert Bolton, 1633. Mr. Bolton was the author of the well-known treatise, entitled The Four Last Things. Anthony Wood refers to his sitting in "that most wicked convention that begun at Westminster, 3 Nov., 1640. But soon after, perceiving full well what mad courses the members thereof took, he left them." He left two sons, Henry and Edward, who are next to be noticed.

Bagshaw, Edward, 1629–1671, son of the preceding, was admitted of Christ Church, Oxf., in 1646, and ordained by the Bishop of Exeter, in 1659. It is enough to make him memorable that he was second master of Westminster School, when the famous Dr. Busby was head master. The two dominies could not agree, and Bagshaw was displaced. For some time he was chaplain to Arthur, Earl of Anglesey. Wood gives a long list of writings, principally controversial, directed against Baxter, L'Estrange, Morley, Bishop of Worcester, and others. These publications have sunk into oblivion. He appears to have inherited his father's belligerent spirit, as well as his cacothese scribendi. Anthony Wood, who seems to spare no man in his wrath, represents young Bagshaw whilst at college as any thing but a modest and well-behaved young man:

"He expressed himself very often intolerably impudent, saucy, and refractory to the Censor, and thereupon was either Scomd [mysterious ceremony] or put out of Commons. . . . When quadragesimal disputations were publicly performed in the schools, he would, without any provocation, take the questions, either of an under-graduate, or bachelor, purposely to dispute with him, and so consequently show his parts, and be shouldered out, or carried out into the quadrangle on the shoulders of his admirers. . . . He showed himself a turbulent and domineering person, not only in his college, but in the University, where 'twas common with him to disturb the Vice-chancellor with interposed speeches, without formalities, and with his hat cocked."—Athen. Oxon.

Added years do not seem to have mellowed his rough temper. Becoming obnoxious to government, he was subjected to twenty-two weeks' imprisonment in Newgate. He was undoubtedly a man of marked ability, but had too much of the fortiter in re.

Bagshaw, Henry, 1632–1709, another son of Edward Bagshaw, Senior, was educated at Westminster School, and Christ Church, Oxf. He held one of the prebends in the Church of Durham. He seems to have played the lamb to his brother's lion, being remarkable for inoffensiveness of character. He pub. A Sermon on Ps. xxxvii. 37, 1676. quantity of MSS. upon various subjects: no less than 50 vols. in folio and quarto, written with his own hand. Among his pub. works are, 1. Waters for a Thirsty Soul, in several sermons on Rev. xxi. 6, 1653. 2. The Miner's Monitor, or a Motion to those whose Labour lies in the Lead and other Mines, 1676. 3. Bailey, Nathan, d. 1742, a philologist of great abilities, was the author of the well-known dictionary which bears his name. The 4th edition (1728) was long the only dictionary in general use. It was enlarged into two vols. 8vo, 1737, and afterwards issued in folio, by Dr. Jos. Nicol Scott. The last was considered the best edition, and is still a favourite with some students. Johnson's first edition of his dictionary was published in 1755. There is a curious anecdote connected with Bailey's work. It was studied through twice, word by word, by Mr. Pitt, afterwards Earl of Chatham. The import and mode of construction of each word carefully examined, so that the strength, the significance, and the beauty of the English language might be properly understood, and enlisted in the service of oratory when required. Some of the sermons of Barrow, it will be remembered, were committed to memory by Mr. Pitt, for the same purpose. "Probably no man, since the days of Cicero, has ever submitted to an equal amount of drudgery." The effects of this philological training were witnessed in the copious vocabulary, and precision in application, which distinguished Chatham's elocution. Wilkes, indeed, seems to criticize his language, when he tells us, "he had not the correctness of language so striking in the great Roman orator, but he had the verba ardentia—the bold, glowing words." But Mr. Wilkes's opinion, upon any subject save the right of suffrage, and choice of rare books, has but little weight with us. Horace Walpole describes Chatham's language as having been amazingly fine. "Not content," says Lord Lyttleton, "to correct and instruct his imagination by the works of men, he borrowed his noblest images from the language of inspiration."

We should not forget to acknowledge the improvements made in the folio edition of Bailey's dictionary by G. Gordon, who made additions to the mathematical part, Phil. Miller to the botanical terms, and T. Lidiard to the etymological portion: the whole being revised by Dr. Scott's

Dr. Harwood's care was bestowed upon the revision of the 8vo edition, of which the 15th edition was pub. about 1759. Mr. Bailey published several other educational works; and a Dictionary Domesticum in 1736.

Bailey, Peter, d. 1823, editor of The Museum, (London,) pub. Sketches from St. George's Fields, by Giordione di Castel Chiuso. A volume containing some of his epic poetry, entitled Idwal, was printed, but not published. It was founded on the events connected with the conquest of Wales. A Greek Poem of Mr. B.'s was pub. in the Classical Journal. His last publication was an anonymous poem in the Spenser measure, called A Queen's Appeal.

Bailey, Philip James, b. 1816, a member of the Bar, son of the proprietor of the Nottingham Mercury, is the author of Festus, The Angel World, 1850, and Mystic, 1855. Few poems upon their first appearance have excited so much attention as Festus:

"It is an extraordinary production, out-Heroding Kant in some of its philosophy, and out-Göthing Goethe, in the introduction of the three persons of the Trinity as interlocutors in its wild plot. Most objectionable as it is on this account, it yet contains so many exquisite passages of genuine poetry, that our admiration of the author's genius overpowers the feeling of mortification at its being misapplied, and meddling with such dangerous topics."—London Literary Gazette, 1839.

Mr. Bailey was but about twenty years of age when Festus was finished. It was published in 1839. His youth has probably mitigated the censure to which it is thought Festus is liable for grave errors both of style and sentiment. The second edition, published three years after the first, was much enlarged, and in later editions it has been still further augmented to about three times its original length. "Every line has undergone the refining crucible of the author's brain, and has been modified by the greater maturity of his mind." A late critic, an exquisite poet himself, thus speaks of Mr. Bailey:

"As a poet in actual achievement, I can have no hesitation in placing him far above either Browning or Stirling. His Festus is in many respects a very remarkable production—remarkable alike for its poetic power, and its utter neglect of all the requirements of poetic art. . . . Yet with all these excesses and defects, we are made to feel that Festus is the work of a poet. . . . In The Angel World, we have the youthful poet more sobered down; and the consequent result has been one not exactly to be wished—its beauties and its defects are each alike less prominent."—*Moir's Poet. Baillie, Joanna, 1764–1851, one of the most distinguished writers in an age prolific in good authors, was born in a

"Scottish Manse, in the upper dale of the Clyde, which has, for its mild character and lavish production of fruit, been termed 'Fruit Land.' . . . One of the finest specimens of the fruit of this luxuriant dale is Joanna Baillie, a name never pronounced by Scott or Briton of any part of the empire but with the veneration due to the truest genius, and the affection which is the birthright of the truest specimens of womanhood."—Howitt's Homes of the Poets.

Miss Baillie for the principal part of her life was a resident of Hampstead, near London, where she died, Feb. 23, 1851. She always lived in retirement, and for some years before her death in strict seclusion. While she received visitors, it is stated that nearly all the great writers of the age had, at one time or another, been among her guests. Scott spent many pleasant hours with her, and on her visit to Scotland in 1806 she spent some weeks in his house at Edinburgh. Her last visit to Scott and to Scotland was in 1820. See Life of Scott.

Their father was a Scottish clergyman; their mother, a sister of the celebrated Dr. William Hunter; and Matthew Baillie, M.D., another distinguished physician, was brother to Joanna and Agnes. Miss Baillie's earliest poetical works appeared anonymously; her first dramatic efforts were published in 1798, under the title of A Series of Plays, in which it is attempted to delineate the stronger passions of the mind; each passion being the subject of a tragedy and a comedy. A second edition was demanded in a few months; in 1802, and in 1812 a third volume appeared. In 1804 she published a volume of Miscellaneous Dramas; and in 1810 The Family Legend, a tragedy, made its appearance. This drama, founded on a Highland tradition, was brought out with success at the Edinburgh theatre, under the auspices of Sir Walter Scott.

"Jan'y 30, 1810. My Dear Miss Baillie,—You have only to imagine all that you could wish to give success to a play, and your conceptions will still fall short of the complete and decided triumph of the Family Legend. . . . Every thing that pretended to distinction, whether from rank or literature, was in the boxes, and in the pit such an aggregate mass of humanity as I have seldom, if ever, witnessed in the same place."—Scott to Miss Baillie.

"Miss Baillie's play went off capitally here. . . . We wept till our hearts were sore, and applauded till our hands were blistered: what could we more?"—Scott to Mr. Morritt.

It was played 14 nights, and in 1814 was acted in London. In 1836 our authoress published three more volumes of Plays. Thus an interval of 38 years had occurred between the first and the last publication of her dramas. In 1823 the Poetic Miscellanies appeared, containing Scott's dramatic sketch of Macduff's Cross, some of Mrs. Hemans's poetry, and Miss Catherine Fanshawe's jeux d'esprit. A few months before her death, Miss Baillie completed an entire edition of her dramatic works. The Martyr had been published separately. She also published Metrical Legends of Exalted Characters; and A View of the general Tenor of the New Testament regarding the Nature and Dignity of Jesus Christ.

Although so advanced in years, Miss Baillie retained the complete possession of her faculties until the last. Lord Jeffrey writes:

"April 28, 1840. I forgot to tell you that we have been twice out to Hampstead to hunt out Joanna Baillie, and found her the other day as fresh, natural, and amiable as ever; and as little like a Tragic Muse. Since old Mrs. Brougham's death, I do not know so nice an old woman."

Again, January 7, 1842, he writes:

"We went to Hampstead, and paid a very pleasant visit to Joanna Baillie, who is marvellous in health and spirits, and youthful freshness and simplicity of feeling, and not a bit deaf, blind, or torpid."

The literary stranger from a distant land sought an introduction to her whose writings had been "household words" since childhood; and who, secluded from the busy world, considered herself a mother to the poor, and was by them esteemed the "Lady Bountiful" of the neighbourhood.

"I am glad that Mrs. Ellis and you have derived any amusement from the House of Aspen. . . . But the Plays of the Passions have put me entirely out of conceit with my Germanized brat; and should I ever again attempt dramatic composition, I would endeavour after the genuine old English model."—Scott to George Ellis, Esq.

In a letter to Miss Baillie, dated 1810, Scott remarks:

"You say nothing about the drama on Fear, for which you have chosen so admirable a subject, and which, I think, will be in your own most powerful manner. I hope you will have an eye to its being actually represented. Perhaps of all passions it is the most universally interesting."

We find the tragedy of Fear again referred to, after its publication in the volume issued in 1812:

"It is too little to say I am enchanted with the said third volume, especially with the two first plays, which in every point not only sustain, but even exalt, your reputation as a dramatist. The whole character of Orin is exquisitely supported, as well as imagined, and the language distinguished by a rich variety of fancy, which I know no instance of, excepting in Shakespeare."

"If Joanna Baillie had known the stage practically, she would never have attached the importance she does to the development of single passions in single tragedies; and she would have invented more stirring incidents to justify the passion of her chaacters, and to give them that air of fatality which, though peculiarly predominant in the Greek drama, will also be found, to a certain extent, in all successful tragedies. Instead of this, she tries to make all the passions of her main characters proceed from the wilful natures of the beings themselves. Their feelings are not precipitated by circumstances, like a stream down a declivity, that leaps from rock to rock; but, for want of incident, they seem often like water on a level, without a propelling impulse."—CAMPBELL: Life of Mrs. Siddons.

We appeal to the reader whether this criticism is not, in fact, just the highest compliment which could have been paid to Miss Baillie's management of her characters. Mr. Campbell's censure really amounts to this: Miss Baillie prefers the exhibition of human nature to catering for stage effect and slavishly following an unnatural code and a heathen morality. Her object was not so much to "take the house by storm," as to take the heart by truth. "That air of fatality," the absence of which Mr. Campbell deploras, is the very error to be eschewed by the Christian teacher, whose duty it is to illustrate the truth that man, as a free agent, will secure happiness by the practice of virtue, and reap misery as the fruit of vice. Love, Hatred, Fear, Religion, Jealousy, Revenge, and Remorse, may each be made to enforce the truth that "the way of the transgressor is hard," or to impress the mind with the abiding conviction that Wisdom's ways are "ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace."

What does Miss Baillie set forth as her own canon? "Let one simple trait of the human heart, one expression of passion, genuine and true to nature, be introduced, and it will stand forth alone in the boldness of reality, whilst the false and unnatural around it slides away on every side, like the rising exhalation of the morning."—Preparatory Discourse to First vol. of Dramas, 1798.

Joanna Baillie, as the author of Count Basil and De Montfort, is entitled to a much higher place among dramatists than the author of Metrical Legends is among mere poets. With much imaginative energy, much observant thought, and great freedom and force of delineation, together with a fine feeling of nature, and an occasional Massingerian softness of diction, it may be claimed for Joanna Baillie that she uniformly keeps apart from the trite and common-place; yet we cannot help feeling a deficiency of art, and tact, and taste, alike in the management of her themes and the structure of her verse."—*Mrs. P. Baillie, Matthew, M.D., 1761-1823, a very distinguished physician, was the son of the Rev. James Baillie, D.D., and Dorothea, sister of the celebrated William and John Hunter: his sister, Joanna Baillie, became as eminent in the walks of literature as her brother in the graver pursuits of medical science. In 1779 he was admitted of Balliol College, Oxf., where he took his degree of physic in 1789. He enjoyed the great advantage of studying under his uncle, William Hunter. Upon the death of the latter, in 1783, he succeeded to the Lectures with Mr. Cruikshank, and gained great popularity by the clearness of his demonstrations, and his power of simplifying abstruse subjects. Although not successful for some time in obtaining much practice, his merits gradually, but surely, forced his way, until his fees were known to amount in one year to £10,000. His quickness of perception in ascertaining the localities of disease made him in great request as a consulting physician. In 1810 he was made physician to Geo. III., and a baronetcy was offered to him, but he declined the honour.

"No one in his day could compete with him in anatomical knowledge, or in an acquaintance with morbid anatomy, or pathology, which of late years has been so successfully cultivated, and which must in a degree be attributed to the example and renown of Baillie."—Rose's Beg. Dict.

He was an extensive contributor to various learned Transactions. See Phil. Trans., 1788-89; Trans. Med. et Chir., 1793-1800; Med. Trans., 1813-15. Dr. Baillie pub. in 1793, The Morbid Anatomy of some of the most Important Parts of the Human Body.

"This work, like every thing he did, was modest and unpretending, but it was not on that account the less valued. A perfect knowledge of his subject, acquired in the midst of the fullest opportunities, enabled him to compress into a small volume more accurate and more useful information than will be found in the works of Bonetus, Morgagni, and Lientaud. This work consisted at first of a plain statement of facts, the description of the appearances presented on dissection, or what could be preserved and exhibited; and he afterwards added the narration of symptoms corresponding with the morbid appearances. This was an attempt of greater difficulty, which will require the experience of successive lives to perfect."—SIR CHARLES BELL.

The Appendix was pub. in 1798; the 2d edition, corrected and greatly enlarged, in 1797; since which there have been many editions. Two years later he pub. A Series of Engravings, tending to illustrate the Morbid Anatomy of some of the most Important Parts of the Human Body, Fascic. LX., Lon., 1799-1802. Royal 4to, 2d edition, 1812.

"His next work was the illustration of Morbid Anatomy, by a series of splendid engravings; creditable at once to his own taste and liberality, and to the state of the arts in this country. He thus laid a solid foundation for pathology, and did for his profession what no physician had done before his time."—SIR CHARLES BELL.

Sir Walter Scott was tenderly attached to Doctor Baillie and his sister Joanna; on the death of the Doctor, he wrote a most eloquent letter to the poetess, which see in Lockhart's Life of Scott.

"We have, indeed, to mourn such a man as, since medicine was first esteemed a useful and honoured science, has rarely occurred to grace its annals, and who will be lamented as long as any one lives who has experienced the advantage of his professional skill, and the affectionate kindness by which it was accompanied."

"We cannot estimate too highly the influence of Dr. Baillie's character on the profession to which he belonged. I ought not, perhaps, to mention his mild virtues and domestic charities; yet the recollection of these must give a deeper tone to our regret, and will be interwoven with his public character, embellishing what seemed to want no addition."—From Sir Charles Bell's Ode on Dr. Baillie.

Baillie, Robert, 1597-1662, a Presbyterian divine of considerable note, and Principal of the University of Glasgow, published a number of learned works, 1633-47, and several were pub. after his death. The best-known of the latter is his Letters and Journals, containing an Impartial Account of Public Transactions, Civil, Ecclesiastical, and Military, in England and Scotland, from 1637 to 1662: with an Account of the Author's Life, and Glossary. This work, the best edition of which was put forth by Mr. Laing in 1841-43, in 3 vols. royal 8vo, was first given to the public in 1775, at the recommendation of Dr. Robertson and David Hume; it contains much valuable information respecting the Civil Wars, and the Proceedings of the Westminster Assembly. His Opus Historicum et Chronologicum, Amst., 1663, is a learned work.

"The author endeavours to give a succinct and connected account of sacred and profane history, from the Creation to the Age of Constantine. He divides the Old Testament into seven epochs, and the New Testament into a number more. At the end of the sections, or epochs, he discusses a variety of chronological questions, in which he discovers his learning and acuteness."—ONNE.

Baird, Robert, D.D., b. 1798, in Fayette county, Pennsylvania, has become widely known in America and Europe by his labours for the extension of the Protestant religion. Dr. Baird has published a number of works, some of which have been translated into foreign tongues. A View of the Valley of the Mississippi, Phila., 1832. Part IV., being the first of vol. ii., was pub. in 1836. This portion comprises the whole of the two Hundreds of Norton and Cleley, the former containing nine parishes, and the latter thirteen. It also contains a variety of other interesting and valuable matter. Part V. was published in 1841. This is but a fragment, a third of one of the usual numbers; yet embracing the entire history of the Hundred of Towcester.

"The History of Northamptonshire has not been exempt from the usual difficulties appertaining to works of a topographical nature, yet, under all hindrances, it has gradually, though slowly, progressed, whilst each successive portion has been as ably produced; and each has been made as singularly valuable as the preceding ones, for its manorial history, for the accurate fulness of its pedigrees, [in which matter Mr. Baker had to contend with great difficulties], and for the comprehensive account of the respective parishes or hamlets that were brought under review."—Lon. Genl. Mag., 1841.

See this periodical for an interesting account of the discouragements under which Mr. Baker found himself placed. At the time of the publication of Part V. he had suffered a loss of no less than 220 subscribers since he first issued his prospectus. The arduous labours of such able and indefatigable topographers should be encouraged by hearty co-operation and a spirit of prompt liberality.

Baker, Sir George, Bart., M.D., 1722-1809, was the son of the Rev. George Baker, archdeacon and registrar of Totness. He was entered at King's College, Cambridge, in 1742, and took the degree of M.D. in 1756. He was honoured by the appointment of physician in ordinary to Queen Charlotte, and afterwards to Geo. III.

Sir George was eminent as a classical scholar; both his Latin and English compositions have been highly commended by severe judges. 'Dieu,' says Bishop Bossuet, on the death of a great man, 'n'a pas lui ôté la vie, mais lui a fait un présent de la mort.' No man, perhaps, ever followed the career of physic, and the elegant paths of the Greek and Roman Muses, for the space of several years, with more success than Sir George Baker; the proofs of which may be seen in his published and unpublished works, the splendour of his fortune, the esteem, respect, and admiration of his contemporaries."—Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, vol. iii.

Baker, Sir Richard, 1568?-1645, the grandson of Sir John Baker, chancellor of the exchequer to Henry VIII., was born at Sissingherst, in Kent. In 1584 he was entered as commoner at Hart Hall in Oxford, where he remained for three years. In 1603 he was knighted by King James I. He married a daughter of Sir George Mainwaring of Ightfield, in Shropshire; and becoming surety for the obligations of some members of this family, he was stripped of his property, and thrown into the Fleet prison, where he remained until his death.

He turned author in the hope of soothing his sorrows, profitably employing his time, and providing for his necessities. His earliest work bears date 1636, when the author was 67 or 68 years of age. It is entitled Cato Variiegatus, or Cato's Moral Distiches varied. This is a poem. In addition to his "Chronicle," of which we shall speak presently, he published a number of other works, the principal of which are: Meditations and Disquisitions on the Lord's Prayer, 1637. This attained its 4th edition in 1640. Sir Henry Wotton, his quondam fellow-student, examined this work in MS., and spoke of it in the following handsome manner:

"I much admire the very character of your style, which seemeth to me to have not a little of the African idea of S. Austin's Age; full of sweet raptures, and of researching conceits; nothing borrowed, nothing vulgar, and yet all flowing from you (I know not how) with a certain equal facility."

Meditations and Disquisitions on the three last Psalms of David, 1639. On the 50th Psalm; the 7 Penitential Psalms; the first Psalm; the seven Consolatory Psalms, 1639-1640. Med. and Prayers on the 7 days of the week, 1640. Apology for Laymen's writing Divinity, 1641. Theatrum Redivivum, in answer to Mr. Prynne's Histrio-Mastrix, 1662. Theatrum Triumphans. The two last are ascribed to him, though not pub. until after his death. It is supposed that Archbishop Williams purchased our author's books for £500. He made some translations from the French and Italian.

Sir Richard is best known by the Chronicle of the Kings of England, (1641,) which was the historical treasury of our ancestors before the publication of Rapin's History. It was repub. in 1653 and 1658. To the last edition was added the reign of Charles I., with a continuation to 1658, by Edward Phillips, nephew to Milton. A fourth edition appeared in 1665, with a continuation to the coronation of Charles II. The Account of the Restoration was principally written by Sir Thomas Clarges, (brother-in-law of the Duke of Albemarle,) though adopted by Phillips. Thomas Blount published a severe criticism upon the work, under the title of Animadversions upon Sir Richard

Baker's Chronicle and its Continuation, which Anthony Wood considered to be well deserved:

"But so it was, that the Author Baker, and his continuator Phillips, having committed very many errors, Thom. Blount pub. Animadversions, &c. . . which book containing only a specimen of the errors, it may easily be discerned what the whole Chronicle containeth."—Athen. Oxon.

Another ed. 1684. Another abridged, and a continuation to 1726, was pub. 1730. In all, 12 editions have been printed. Another in 1733, called the best edition, but it lacks many curious papers contained in the early editions, especially in the first ed., (1641.)

Thomas Blount was not the only censurer of Sir Richard's Chronicle. Bishop Nicolson remarks that

"The author was a person of those accomplishments in wit and language, that his Chronicle has been the best read and liked of any hitherto published; the method is new, and seems to please the rabble; but learned men will be of another opinion."—Historical Library, Part I.

"It is a very mean and jejune performance; and nowise to be relied upon."—Biog. Brit.

"Being reduced to method, and not according to time, purposely to please gentlemen and novices, many chief things to be observed therein, as name, time, &c. are egregiously false, and consequently breed a great deal of confusion in the peruser, especially if he be curious or critical."—A. Wood.

In utter contempt of the critics, edition after edition appeared, with all the old blunders and erroneous dates repeated. The edition of 1730 contains corrections of Baker's errors; but then Phillips's continuation is corrected, many public places, lists of names, &c. being omitted, or the substance only of them given. So we say with the Hebrew of ancient time—"The old is better."

Bishop Nicolson complains that

"So little regard have we for truth, if a story be but handsomely told, the chronicle has been reprinted since that time, and sells as well as ever notwithstanding that no notice is taken of the animadversions, but all the old faults remain uncorrected."

It was a great book for the country squire's round-table; the companion of the Family Bible, the dog-eared, piecrusted Shakespeare, and Fox's Book of Martyrs. Sir Roger de Coverley knew and loved it, for Addison tells us that he found

"Since I was with him in the country, he had drawn many observations together, out of his reading in Baker's Chronicle."—Spectator, No. 289.

But Daines Barrington seems to think that this notice did not benefit Baker's reputation any:

"Baker is by no means so contemptible a writer as he is generally supposed to be: it is believed that the ridicule on his Chronicle, arises from its being part of the furniture of Sir Roger de Coverley's hall in one of the Spectators."

But who doubts that this notice by Addison has sold many hundreds of copies since? Nay, who does not feel a violent desire to possess the book himself, when he is told that the good Sir Roger thumbed its pages, and drew from them his "many observations?"

How Dibdin can so misrepresent Anthony Wood as to charge him impliedly with commending Baker's work, we cannot understand. Anthony Wood does any thing else, as we have just shown; and as the reader will see at large by referring to the Athen. Oxon. Dibdin likewise does great injustice to Baker in presuming that he was "a gay and imprudent man," because he died in the Fleet prison. Imprudence, indeed, of one description brought him into the prison; but not that kind of imprudence for which gay men are generally reproached.

Baker made no secret of his opinion as to the merits of his Chronicle. He was not like some authors who apologize for writing until we wonder why they have written, and then deplore their many faults, until we marvel they have not thrown their books into the fire. On the contrary, Sir Richard assures us that his "Chronicle was collected with so great care and diligence, that if all other of our Chronicles were lost, this only would be sufficient to inform posterity of all passages memorable or worthy to be known."

Having thus kindly dispelled any fears which the world might entertain of the consequences of a general literary conflagration, Sir Richard goes on in the same liberal spirit, to assure his readers that he gives them "all passages of State and Church," and determined to satisfy every craving for information however extravagant, he promises to record "all other observations proper for a Chronicle." This is tolerably liberal; but nothing is too large for Sir Richard's charity. What entertainment did that Goth of a son-in-law of his keep from us—that "one Smith," as he is contemptuously denominated, and rightly enough,—when with unhallowed hands he destroyed Sir Richard's autobiography!

Fuller speaks of him affectionately:

"His youth he spent in learning, the benefit whereof he reaped in his old age, when his estate through suretyship (as I have heard him complain) was very much impaired. But God may smile on them on whom the world doth frown; whereof his pious old age was a memorable instance, when the storm on his estate forced him to fly for shelter to his studies and devotions. He wrote an 'Exposition on the Lord's Prayer,' which is co-eval with the best comments which professed divines have written on that subject."—Worthies.

"Baker discovered a rule or method for determining the centre of a circle, which shall cut a given parabola in as many points as a given equation, to be constructed, has real roots. This method is generally known as the central rule. The central rule is founded on this principle of the parabola: that if a line be inscribed in the curve perpendicular to any diameter, the rectangle of the segments of this line is equal to the rectangle of the intercepted part of the diameter and the parameter of the axis."—Rose's Biog. Dict.

Baker, Thomas, 1656-1740, a learned antiquary, was born at Crook, in the parish of Lancaster, in the Bishopric of Durham. In 1674 he was entered at St. John's College, Cambridge, and in 1679 became a Fellow of the college; in 1686 he was ordained priest by Bishop Barlow. He accepted the post of chaplain to Crew, Bishop of Durham, who gave him, in 1687, the rectory of Long Newton. He proved his conscientiousness by refusing to read the declaration of indulgence of James II., and afterwards by declining to take the oath to the new government. In 1717, with twenty-one others, he was deprived of his fellowship. After this event, he was accustomed to add to his signature Socius Ejectus. He continued to reside in his college as a commoner-master until his death. Having now time and opportunities for study, he devoted himself to investigations in history, biography, and antiquities, with a zeal seldom witnessed. So extensive were his inquiries, and so liberal was he in his communications of their results, that "There is scarcely a work in the department of English History, Biography, and Antiquities, that appeared in his time, in which we do not find acknowledgments of the assistance which had been received from Mr. Baker. We may mention, particularly, Dr. Walker, in his Account of the Sufferings of the Clergy; Burnet; Dr. John Smith, the editor of Bede; Dr. Knight, in his Life of Erasmus; Browne Willis; Francis Peck; Dr. Ward, in his Lives of the Gresham Professors; Dr. Richardson, in his work on the Lives of the English Bishops; Ames in his Typographical Antiquities; Lewis, in his History of the English Translations of the Bible; Strype and Hearne, in many of their works."—Rose's Biog. Dict.

He made large transcriptions from historical and other documents; 23 vols. of MSS. he gave to the Earl of Oxford. These form part of the Harleian MSS., (Brit. Museum, 7028 to 7050.) He also left 19 vols. of his MSS. to the public library at Cambridge. Mr. Baker published but one work, Reflections on Learning, showing the insufficiency thereof in its several particulars, in order to evince the usefulness and necessity of Revelation, Lon., 1710. This work went through eight editions, and was one of the most popular books in the language. The author has a curious passage on philosophy, which we quote:

"Since Aristotle's philosophy has been exploded in the schools, under which we had more peace, and possibly almost as much truth as we have had since, we have not been able to fix any more, but have been wavering from one point to another."

Mr. Bosworth, in his Method of Study, ranks this work among the classics for purity of style; but different views have been expressed:

"Though the style is perspicuous and manly, it can scarcely be applauded as rising to any degree of elegance. It is, undoubtedly, in several respects, a work of very considerable merit."

Great disappointment was felt that Mr. Baker did not complete his design of writing an Athena Cantabrigiensis, on the plan of Wood's Athena Oxoniensis. His MSS. collections relative to the history and antiquities of the University of Cambridge amounted to 39 vols. in folio, and 3 in 4to: (in British Museum, and Pub. Lib. of Camb. See above.) Has Cambridge no son with sufficient zeal to undertake the still-neglected duty of an Athen. Cantab.? Baker was a striking instance of the truth of Hearne's complaint of the students of monuments and records, quoted by Dr. Johnson in the Rambler.—Biog. Brit.

"As their employment consists first in collecting, and afterwards in arranging, or abstracting, what libraries afford them, they ought to amass no more than they can digest; but when they have undertaken a work, they go on searching and transcribing, call for new supplies—when they are already over-burdened, and at last leave their work unfinished. It is, says he, the business of a good antiquary, as of a good man, to have mortality always before him."

Of our author Hearne speaks highly:

"Optandum est ut sua quoque collectiones de antiquitatibus Cantabrigiensiis juris faciat publici cl. Bakerus, quippe qui eruditiois summâ judicioque acri et subactio polleat."

Dr. Knight styles him, "the greatest master of the antiquities of this our university." Horace Walpole wrote a Life of Baker (in the quarto ed. of his works) in 1778, of which a friend of Mr. Nichols writes to him: "I never thought that the sprightly, inquisitive Horace Walpole could ever have written any thing of so little information or curiosity."

Dr. Richard Rawlinson gives a very great character of Mr. Baker:

"That the people of St. John's should have highly respected Mr. Baker, is surely much to the credit of the Society; especially if we consider how little people, not actually members, are liked for staying and taking up room."—T. F., in Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, which see for a detailed account of Baker.

Mr. Master pub. Memoirs of the Life and Writings of our author, with a Catalogue of his MS. collections: a synopsis of the latter may be seen in the Biog. Brit.

That the people of St. John's did "highly respect Mr. Baker," we have evidence in a letter of Warburton's: (Correspond. with Dr. Birch in Brit. Museum.)

"Good old Mr. Baker of St. John's has indeed been very obliging. The people of St. John's almost adore the man; for as there is much in him to esteem, much to pity, and nothing (but in virtue and learning) to envy, he has all the justice at present done him, that few people of merit have till they are dead."

In lamenting over the non-execution of Mr. Baker's Athen. Cantab., we are led to bestow a few more tears on the abortive plan of Dr. Dibdin's intended magnificent History of the University of Oxford. But we cannot linger more. Let the reader refer to Dibdin's Reminiscences, vol. ii. p. 849. We shall defer our remarks upon the subject until we overtake old Anthony Wood, some years hence, in the letter W. "Some years hence," did we say? Let us remember, "Vitas summa brevis spem nos vetat inchoare longam!"

Baker, Wm., 1742-1785, a learned English printer, carried on his business in Cullum Street and Ingram Court, London. He wrote Peregrinations of the Mind, through the most general and interesting Subjects which are usually agitated in Life, by the Rationalist, Lon., 1770. Theses Græcæ et Latine Selectæ, 1780.

"An elegant correspondence between him and Mr. Robinson, author of The Indolent Tree, printed at Oxford, 1772, and some letters of inquiry into the difficulties in the Greek Language, which still exist, are proofs of his great erudition, and the opinion entertained of him by some of the first scholars. . . . In the Greek, Latin, French, and Italian Languages, he was critically skilled, and had some knowledge of the Hebrew. . . . Such was his modesty, that many among his oldest and most familiar acquaintance were ignorant of his learning, and when learning was discussed, his opinion could never be known without an absolute appeal to his judgment."—*Chalmers's Biog. Bakewell, F. C. Natural Evidence of a Future Life, derived from the Properties and Actions of Animate and Inanimate Matter; a contribution to Natural Theology, designed as a Sequel to the Bridgewater Treatises, 1849. This work has been highly commended. Mr. B. is the author of the Philosophical Conversations.

"Mr. Bakewell establishes by analogical reasoning a strong probability for the immortality of the soul; his arguments are always ingenious, and candidly stated, and he draws strong conclusions from his premises."—London Athenæum.

"This may claim to rank as a tenth Bridgewater Treatise."

"We strongly recommend this volume. Mr. Bakewell is evidently a master of reasoning and language. The reader who accompanies him through his arguments, will be delighted by the acuteness of his reasoning, and have his mind enriched by much curious knowledge, both in physical and physiological science."—London Spectator.

Baldock, Baldocke, or Baudake, Ralph de, d. 1314, Bishop of London, and lord high chancellor of England, was educated at Merton College, Oxford. He was a prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral, arch-deacon of Middlesex, and succeeded Richard de Gravesend in the See of London in 1304. His election being controverted, the pope's confirmation was requisite. The necessary delay postponed his consecration until 1306, when he was consecrated at Lyons by the Bishop of Alba. He contributed 200 marks towards building the chapel of St. Mary on the east side of St. Paul. He founded also a chantry of two priests in the same church, near the altar of St. Erkenwald. He wrote, 1. Historia Anglica, or a history of the British affairs down to his own time. Not extant: Leland says he saw it in London. 2. Baldwin, Thos., d. 1190, the celebrated preacher of the third Crusade, was born at Exeter. In 1181 he was elected Bishop of Worcester, and in 1184 was translated to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. He accompanied Richard I. to the Holy Land, and died at the siege of Ptolemais. He wrote a number of works.

"The treatise De Sacramento Altaris, Tanner states, was pub. at Cambridge in 1521, 8vo; and in 1531, 4to.

"Bibliotheca Patrum Cisterciensium . . . tomus quintus . . . Labore et studio F. Bertrandi Tiesler, Boni-fonte, Anno Domini, 1662, fol. pp. 1-159. Baldwini, ex abbate Fordensi ordinis Cisterc. Baldwin, Sir Timothy, of Burwarton, in Shropshire, became a Commoner of Balliol College, Oxford, in 1634, and Fellow of All Souls' in 1640. In 1654 Baldwin wrote The Privileges of an Ambassador, elicited by the case of Don Pantaleon Sa, brother to the Portuguese ambassador, who had killed an Englishman. In 1656 he pub. a treatise left by Lord Herbert, Expeditio Buckinghami Ducis in Ream Insulam; and in 1663, a treatise of Dr. Richard Zouch, The Jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England asserted against Sir Edward Coke's Articuli Admiraltatis in 22d chap. of his Jurisdiction of Courts.—*Rose's Biog. Baldwin, or Baldwyn, William, born in the west of England, spent several years at Oxford in the study of logic and philosophy. He was subsequently a schoolmaster and divine. He is said to have been one of those scholars who followed printing in order to promote the Reformation. In this last capacity he was employed by Edward Whitchurch. Bale and Pits ascribe some comedies to him; and it is known that he was "engaged in the reigns of Edward VI., and Philip and Mary, if not earlier, in preparing theatrical entertainments for the court." He compiled A Treatise of Moral Philosophy, printed by Whitechurch, 1547-1549, and sine anno, (Bib. Anglo-Poet. £10 10s.) afterwards enlarged by Palfryman, and several more editions pub. The Canticles or Balades of Salomon, phrase-lyke declared in English meters, 1549: printed by himself. Funeralles of King Edward the Sixth, 1560. This little tract of 24 pp. was sold at the Roxburghe sale for £19 19s. A copy in the Bib. Anglo-Poet. is priced £25. It is the rarest of his works: see British Bibliographer, vol. ii. p. 97.

"A great error concludes the description, viz.: The subject of this article escaped the researches of Ritson. A reference to Ritson's Bibliographia Poetica, p. 122, will shew that he has given the accurate title, date, and printer's name."—Bib. Anglo-Poet.

Another edition, Lon., 1817. Presented to the members of the Roxburghe Club by the Rev. J. W. Dodd. Another reprint appeared in 4to, 10s. 6d.

Wood ascribes to Baldwin, The Use of Adagies, Similies, and Proverbs, and some Comedies. "When printed, or where, I cannot find." That intelligent antiquary, Mr. J. Payne Collier, considers Baldwin to have been the author of a tract of great rarity, Beware the Cat, 1561-34. (See Hist. of Eng. Dram. Poetry.) In this tract are some notices of matters connected with the reputed author's history. But may Baldwin's name ever be honoured as one of the authors and editors of the noble MIRROR FOR MAGISTRATES! Of this grand work, which "illuminates with no common lustre that interval of darkness which occupies the annals of English poetry from Surrey to Spenser," we had intended to give an account, but to do justice to the subject requires far more space than we can afford. It will be referred to again under the name "Sackville." Let the reader refer to Warton's History of English Poetry, Brydges' Censura Litteraria, and Haslewood's edition of the work, (Introduction,) 1815. The Induction by Sackville, Earl of Dorset, has been lauded as containing

"Some of the finest strains of English poetry, and some of the most magnificent personifications of abstract ideas in our language; exceeding Spenser in dignity, and not short of him in brilliance."

That man or woman who possesses A MYRRORE FOR MAGISTRATES, Wherein may be seen by example of others, with how greivous plagues vices are punished, and how frayl and vnable worldly prosperitie is founde, euen of those whom Fortune seemeth most highly to favour;—we say, that man or woman who possesses this vast treasury of poetry, philosophy, morality, and divinity, can afford to dispense with three-fourths of the modern productions of the Muse. We contemplate our beautiful copy with complacency as we pay this deserved tribute.

Baldwyn, Rev. Edward, author of a number of miscell. and educational works, Lon., 1787-1812.

Bale, John, 1495-1564? Bishop of Ossory, in Ireland, was one of the early English dramatists, and by his literary and other labours, a zealous promoter of the Reformation. He was educated at the monastery of the Carmelites in Norwich, and from thence was sent to Jesus College, Cambridge. The date of his renunciation of the Roman Catholic Church cannot be certainly ascertained, but he attributes to "the illustrious the Lord Wentworth, that he was stirred up to discover the glory of the Son of God and his own depravity." This nobleman and Lord Cromwell were his patrons; and on the execution of the latter he withdrew into Flanders, where he remained for eight years. In 1552 he was nominated by King Edward VI. to the see of Ossory. He incurred the dislike of the Roman Catholics by two plays, intended to promote the Protestant faith,—John the Baptist, and God's Promises,—which were publicly acted on a Sunday in Kilkenny. On the death of Edward VI. he was obliged to fly for refuge to Holland, and from thence to Basle in Switzerland. After the death of Queen Mary he returned to England, but preferred a prebend in the Cathedral church of Canterbury, which he retained until his death, to the resumption of his former Bishopric. Bale was a voluminous author. His dramatic pieces were intended and calculated to promote the cause of the Reformation. He tells us (Scriptor Illustr. M. Brit. Summ.) that he was the author of nineteen Miracle Plays, eleven of which represent events in the life of our Saviour, and eight are miscellaneous. The titles of these plays will give some idea of their character:

Series of the Life of Christ.

1. OF CHRIST, WHEN HE WAS 12 YEARS OLD, one comedy.
- 2-3. OF HIS BAPTISM AND TEMPTATION, two comedies.
4. OF LAZARUS RAISED FROM THE DEAD, one comedy.
5. OF THE COUNCILS OF THE BISHOPS, one comedy.
6. OF SIMON THE LEPER, one comedy.
7. OF THE LORD'S SUPPER, AND WASHING THE FEET, one comedy.

- 8-9. OF THE PASSION OF CHRIST, two comedies.

- 10-11. OF THE SEPULTURE AND RESURRECTION, two coms.

Miscellaneous Dramas.

12. UPON BOTH MARRIAGES OF THE KING. (Henry VIII.)
13. AGAINST MOMUS AND ZOILUS.
14. THE TREACHERIES OF THE PAPISTS.
15. AGAINST THE ADULTERATORS OF GOD'S WORD.
16. OF KING JOHN OF ENGLAND.
17. OF THE IMPOSTURES OF THOMAS à BECKETT.
18. OF THE CORRUPTIONS OF THE DIVINE LAWS.
19. THE IMAGE OF LOVE.

"Each of these he states that he 'compiled,' not merely because he borrowed his materials from the Old and New Testaments, but, perhaps, because he adopted portions of pieces of the same description already existing. The subjects are treated as in the older specimens, and even in point of language and versification Bale has not much the advantage of his predecessors."—Collier's History of Eng. Dram. Poetry.

In 1538 these plays were printed abroad in 4to. They contain the first attempts to instruct the public mind in the doctrines of the Reformation, by the instrumentality of the stage. Bale says that the representation of his plays, referred to before, at the Market Cross of Kilkenny, in August, 1553, "was to the small contentation of the prestes and other papistes there."—The Vocation of John Bale. Dramatic entertainments, representing the lives of saints, and scriptural stories, had long before this time been a favourite entertainment with the populace. The play of Saint Catherine was acted at Dunstable about the year 1100.

"London, for its theatrical exhibitions, had holy plays, or the representation of miracles wrought by confessors, and of the sufferings of martyrs."—Description of London, by William Fitz-Stephen, of the 12th century.

Matthew Paris, about the year 1240, says that they were such as "Miracula Vulgariter Appellamus," proving their publicity. See Warton's History of English Poetry. This learned writer, speaking of Bale's plays, remarks:

"What shall we think of the state, I will not say of the stage, but of common sense, when these deplorable dramas could be endured? Of an age when the Bible was profaned and ridiculed from a principle of plety? But the fashion of acting mysteries appears to have expired with this writer."

A dramatic piece of Bale's, thought to be the most remarkable of his productions, entitled De Joanne Anglorum Rege, and Kynge Johan, was printed in 1838 by the Camden Society from the author's MS., preserved in the library of the Duke of Devonshire.

"It is a most singular mixture of history and allegory; the events of the reign of John being applied to the times of Henry VIII., and to the struggles between Protestantism and Popery."

In the introduction to this impression, it is remarked of Bale:

"He possesses no peculiar claim as a poet; and though he could be severe as a moral censor, and violent as a polemic, he had little elevation and a limited fancy; his versification is also scarcely as good as that of some of his contemporaries."

Bale's most celebrated work in his collection of British Biography, first published under the title of Illustrum Majoris Britannicæ Scriptorum, hoc est, Angliæ, Cambriæ, et Scotiæ, Summarium, Ipswich, 1549: this edition contained only five centuries of writers. To these he added four more centuries, and made corrections and additions. The book thus enlarged was entitled Scriptorum Illustrum

Majoris Britanniae, quam nunc Angliam et Scotiam vocant, Catalogus; a Japheto per 3618 annos, usque ad annum hunc Domini, &c., Basil, 1557-59. Of this work very different opinions have been given. Warton censures it strongly:

"This work, perhaps originally undertaken by Bale as a vehicle of his sentiments in religion, is not only full of misrepresentation and partialities, arising from his religious prejudices, but of general inaccuracies, proceeding from negligence or misinformation. Even those more ancient Lives which he transcribes from Leland's commentary on the same subject, are often interpolated with false facts, and impudently marked with a misapplied zeal for reformation. He is angry with many authors who flourished before the 13th century for being Catholics."—Hist. of Eng. Poetry.

But Gesner, Bishop Godwin, Laurence Humphrey, Vogler, Bishop Montagu, and others, appear on our author's side. But, on the other hand, again we have Vossius, John Pits, (Hic Lelandi Catalogum non tam prolixo auxit, quam prodigiosa depravavit,) Wharton, Nicolson, Harrington, and Leland, who array themselves against the venerable bishop.

Bales, Peter, 1547-1610? the most skilful English penman of his own, or probably of any, period, is supposed by Wood to have been a member of Oxford Univ.

"He spent many years in sciences among the Oxoniens, particularly at Gloucester Hall."

He is the author of Brachygraphy, or the Writing Schoolmaster, in Three Books, teaching Swift Writing, True Writing, and Fair Writing, 1590-97, 1673. We are told of a Bible, written by him in short-hand, so small that it would lie in an English-walnut-shell!

Baley, or Bailey, Walter, M.D., 1529-1592, was admitted perpetual Fellow of New College, Oxf., in 1550. In 1561 he was appointed the Queen's Professor of Physic in the University of Oxford. He wrote a number of professional works, which were pub. 1587-1602. Directions for Health, posthumous, 1626. See Wood's Athen. Oxon.

Balfour, Surgeon. Con. to Med. Obs. & Inq. 1670.

Balfour, Alexander, 1767-1829, a tradesman, and subsequently a clerk in the publishing house of Mr. Blackwood at Edinburgh, wrote Campbell, or the Scottish Probationer, 1819. Contemplation, and other poems, 1820. The Foundling of Glenhorth, or the Smuggler's Cave, 1823. Highland Mary. He edited the poetical works of Richard Gall, and contributed to the Edinburgh Magazine until its expiration in 1826. Balfour, Francis, a Scottish physician of note, a native of Edinburgh, and surgeon of the Hon. East India Company, resided chiefly at Calcutta. He pub. a number of prof. works, Edin., Calcutt., and Lon., 1767-95. A collection of Treatises on the Effect of Sol-Lunar Influence in Fevers, Lon., 1812: this is a 2d edition of a Treatise on the Influence of the Moon in Fevers, Calcutt., 1784. His theory is that all fevers are affected by the influence of the moon. He found that the "accession of fever takes place during the three days which either precede or follow the full moon." These opinions it is said have met with "support and confirmation from the observations of Lind in Bengal, of Cleghorn in Minorca, of Fontana in Italy, of Jackson in Jamaica, of Gillespie at St. Lucia, of Annesley in Madras."

Balfour, Sir James, d. 1657, a Scottish antiquary and poet, was a friend of Sir Robert Aytoun, Drummond of Hawthornden, Segar, Dodsworth, and Dugdale. To the last-named he communicated the facts which we find in the Monasticon Anglicanum, in the department Coenobia Scotia. Balfour subsequently pub. these papers with some other matter, under the title of Monasticon Scoticum. He received a diploma in 1628 from the London College of Arms, which proves the zeal and knowledge which marked his antiquarian researches. He was a strong opponent to the attempt to force the liturgy of the Church of England upon the people of Scotland. A number of his MSS. are preserved in the Advocates' Lib. at Edinburgh. There was pub. in Edin., 1824, Lon., 1825, his Annals of Scotland from MLVII-MDCXL; and Memorials and Passages of Church and State from MDCXLI-MDCCLII, &c. Pub. from the original MSS. preserved in the Lib. of Faculty of Advocates, (by James Haig,) 4 vols., with portrait by Livars.

Balfour, James, 1703-1795, of Pilrig, Scotland. 1. Delineation of Morality. 2. Philosophical Dissertations, Edin., 1782. These two treatises were an attack on the speculations of David Hume; but they were written with so much candour and good feeling that Hume wrote to him to express his feelings of esteem and request his friendship. 3. Philosophical Essays, 8vo.

The same work is also pub. in two Parts: Part 1, Structural and Morphological Botany; Part 2, Elements of Vegetable Physiology, Classification, Botanical Geography, and Fossil Botany, with a Glossary of Terms.

"In Dr. Balfour's Class-Book of Botany the author seems to have exhausted every attainable source of information. Few, if any, works on the subject contain such a mass of carefully-collected and condensed matter; and certainly none are more copiously or better illustrated."—Hooker's Journal of Botany.

Balfour, or Balforeas, Robert, a Scottish philosopher of the seventeenth century, President of Guyenne College at Bordeaux. Barthius praises in high terms an edition of Cleomedes pub. (Burd., 1605) by Balfour.

"His writings display an extent of erudition which reflects honour on the literary character of his country."—Fring's Lives of Scottish Poets, q. v.

Balguy, John, 1686-1748, was entered of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1702, where he took the degree of M.A. in 1726. He took part in the Bangor controversy, and pub. three pamphlets in defence of Dr. Hoadly, under the name of Silvius. His treatises were levelled against Drs. Stebbing and Sherlock. In 1726, he attacked the opinions of Lord Shaftesbury, in A Letter to a Deist. In 1728, he pub. The Foundation of Moral Goodness; or, A Further Inquiry into the Original of our Idea of Virtue. This was in answer to Mr. Hutcheson's Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue. His Essay on Redemption, pub. 1741, was one of his most popular works. He burned many of his sermons, that his son (see next article) might be thrown entirely on his own resources.

Balguy, Thomas, D.D., 1716-1795, son of the above, was admitted of St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1732, and took the degree of D.D. in 1758. In the same year Bishop Hoadly appointed him Archdeacon of Winchester. He preached at the consecration of Bishops Shipley, Shutte, Barrington, North, Hard, and Moore. These Sermons were all pub. separately, 1769-75. Divine Benevolence Asserted and Vindicated from the Reflections of Ancient and Modern Sceptics, 1782. He edited the Serms. of Dr. Powell, to which he prefixed his Life, and in 1785 edited a new edition of his father's Essay on Redemption. Two years later he pub. Discourses on Various Subjects.

Ball, John, a preacher who participated in the Kent insurrection in 1381, of which Wat Tyler was the hero, is famous for having preached a sermon to a congregation of one hundred thousand insurgents on Blackheath, from the text

"When Adam delved, and Eve span,
 Who was then the gentleman?"

The preacher, in company with Jack Straw, and about 1500 others, was hanged July 2, 1381. Some of his letters are preserved in the chronicles of the times. He used his pen as well as his voice to propagate sedition.

Ball, or Balle, John, 1585-1640, a Puritan divine of considerable note, entered Brasenose College, Oxford, 1602; B.A. at St. Mary's Hall, 1608. He wrote a number of theological and ecclesiastical works. A Short Treatise concerning all the principal grounds of the Christian Religion. A very popular work, which Wood tells us was pub. 14 times ante 1632. It was extensively used in the instruction of children. In 1666 it was translated into Turkish by William Seamen, an English traveller, under the title of Catechism, or Principal Grounds of the Christian Religion, Oxf. A Treatise of Faith, Lon., 1632. Several of his works were in opposition to publications in favour of secession from the Church of England.

"Though somewhat disaffected to ceremonies and Church discipline, yet he confuted such as conceived the corruption therein ground enough for a separation."—Athen. Oxon.; Fuller's Worthies.

Baxter speaks of him in high terms:

"He deserved an high esteem and honour as the best bishop in England; yet looking after no higher things than these," i. e. the small profits of the little school, and his £20 yearly salary.

"He was an excellent schoolman and schoolmaster, (qualities seldom meeting in the same man,) a painful preacher, and a profitable writer; and his Treatise of Faith cannot be sufficiently commended. Indeed he lived by faith, having but small means to maintain him, . . . and yet was wont to say he had enough, enough, enough: thus contentment consisted not in heaping on more fuel, but in taking away some fire. He had a holy facetiousness in his discourse. When his friend, having had a fall from his horse, and said that he never had the like deliverance, 'Yea,' said Mr. Balle, 'and an hundred times when you never fell; accounting God's preserving us from, equal to his rescuing us out of dangers. . . . He hated all new lights and pretended inspirations besides Scripture: and when one asked him, 'whether he at any time had experience thereof in his own heart.' 'No,' said he, 'I bless God; and if I should ever have such phantasies, I hope God would give me grace to resist them.' Notwithstanding his small means, he lived himself comfortably, relieved others charitably, left his children competently, and died piously."—Worthies.

Ballard, George, d. 1755, was born at Campden, in Gloucestershire. Whilst employed in the shop of a habit-maker, he devoted his spare hours to the study of the Saxon language. His zeal for learning attracted the notice of that excellent Saxon scholar, Mrs. Elstob. By the kindness of the first Lord Chedworth, he was removed to Oxford, and an annuity of £60 (he declined to accept £100, which was offered to him) was allowed him. He was appointed one of the eight clerks of Magdalene College, and was subsequently chosen one of the University beadles. He pursued his researches with great zeal in the Bodleian Library, and left the results in the shape of large collections of MSS., now preserved in the same depository. His account of Campden Church was read before the Society of Antiquaries, Nov. 21, 1771. His only printed work is Memoirs of Several Ladies of Great Britain, who have been celebrated for their Writings, or Skill in the learned Languages, Arts, and Sciences, Oxford, 1752; Lon., 1775. Sixty-two ladies are here chronicled, commencing with Juliana of Norwich, born about 1347, and ending with Constantia Grierson, who died in 1733.

"It is pretty certain that England hath produced more women famous for literary accomplishments, than any other nation in Europe."—Preface.

"We find that the lives of eminent or worthy persons are generally, and deservedly, well received by the public: of which we have here a new instance, added to the many of prior date, that it would be needless to cite, in Mr. Ballard's Memoirs; a work that has not wanted the assistance and encouragement due to so commendable an undertaking."—Monthly Review, 1753.

Hearne notices Mr. Ballard's labours:

"I know not what additions Mr. George Ballard can make to Mr. Stowe's life; this I know, that being a taylor himself, he is a great admirer of that plain, honest antiquary."—Letter to Baker, 1735; quoted by Nichols.

Ballard, Reave. Sermons, 1745-46.

Ballenden, or Bellenden, or Balantyn, Sir, or Dr. John, d. 1550, a Scottish poet and historian, was a doctor of the Sorbonne at Paris. By command of James V., he translated Hector Boëthius's History from the Latin into the Scottish tongue. The translation was made "with a good deal of freedom, departing often from his author, but generally for the sake of truth; and sometimes, also, adding circumstances which, perhaps, might not be known to Hector Boece. However, his version, as he called it, was very well received both in Scotland and England, and soon became the standard of that History."—Biog. Brit.

He was archdeacon of Murray, canon of Rosse, and clerk of the register. His trans. of the first five books of Livy has been highly commended:

"As a specimen of the ancient language of Scotland and of the prose style of the purest of her early writers, this translation of Livy is peculiarly valuable. In rendering the animated descriptions of Livy's pictured page, the translator evinces all the imagination and vigour of a writer untrammelled by the necessity of adopting the thoughts and sentiments of another."

"This is a very interesting volume; Sir George Ballingall is already favourably known to the profession by former writings, and the present work will not derogate from his literary or his professional reputation."—Johnson's Journal.

"We are glad to see this admirable work attain to its third edition. If the place of a great school of Military Surgery could be supplied by a book, Sir George Ballingall has gone far to supply that desideratum."—United Service Magazine.

Balmanno, Mrs. Mary, wife of the succeeding, b. in Derbyshire, England, has gained some reputation as an artist, poetess, and composer of music. She has contrib. many articles to the English Annuals, and pub. several lyrics since her residence in America. She has edited the Gems of Moore's Poetry, (illustrated,) with prose introduction and conclusions to each, and an illustrated edition of Byron's Works. She pub., N.Y., 1858, 8vo, a vol. entitled Pen and Pencil, illustrated with cuts, a majority of which were drawn on the block by her own hand. The beautiful drawing of all the flowers mentioned by Shakespeare, which excited so much attention at the New York Crystal Palace in 1853-54 and was so highly lauded in the English and American papers, was the production of Mrs. Balmanno. Her force and depth of colouring have elicited great admiration.

Balmanno, Robert, b. 1780, near Aberdeen, Scotland, is a descendant of an ancient family, of which there are records existing temp. James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. Mr. B. has contributed many articles to the London periodicals and to the New York Knickerbocker, Evening Post, and Graham's (Phila.) Magazine. For many years he has been a resident of New York; and, although now (1858) at an advanced stage of life, he is still distinguished for that literary enthusiasm and exquisite taste in letters and the fine arts which rendered him so great a favourite with Sir Thomas Lawrence, C. A. Stothard, Henry Fuseli, Thomas Moore, Sir Martin A. Shee, Crofton Croker, and a host of departed worthies, whose numerous unpublished letters to Mr. B. and now in his possession would form a rich entertainment to the present generation. Balnaves, Henry, d. 1679, was a native of Kirkcaldy, county of Fife, Scotland. He was a zealous promoter of the Reformation. John Knox gives him the character of a very learned and pious divine. In 1563 he was made one of the Lords of Session, and was one of the committee appointed to revise the book of discipline. Whilst imprisoned in the castle of Rouen, he wrote what is called by Knox, a Comfortable Treatise of Justification, Edin., 1650. The high estimation in which this work is still held, is evinced by its having been lately republished at a cheap rate by the London Religious Tract Society, for wide circulation. Confession of Faith, concerning how the troubled Man should seek refuge in God, Edin., 1584. This work has a prefatory Epistle from John Knox. There is a poem of Balnaves's in Ramsay's Collection.

He had a prebend in the Church of Exeter, and subsequently was a minister at Sherburn in Dorsetshire, of which he was deprived by the Act of Uniformity of 1662. His independence of character is amply proved by the peculiarities of the views which he not only held, but zealously promulgated. His principal works are Judgment for Observation of the Jewish Sabbath, Lon., 1672, sent in a letter to Mr. Will Ben. All in One, Lon., 1677.

"The design of which fantastic and unintelligible book is for the advancement and augment of useful Arts, and of profitable Sciences, in a Scriptural way, and that all Philosophy be taught out of the Scripture, and not from Heathen authors. . . . Anthony Wood makes him the subject of one of his strongly-drawn portraits:

"He was always a person so strangely fickle and unsteady in his judgment, that he was first a Churchman, then a Presbyterian, afterwards an Independent, or, at least, a sinner with them, an Anabaptist, and at length almost a complacent Jew, and what not. He was also so enthusiastical and canting, that he did almost crase and distract many of his disciples by his amazing and frightful discourses."

Bampton, John, of New Coll., Oxon. Sermon, 1611.

Bampton, Rev. Jas., Canon of Salisb., 1689-1751, educated at Trinity College, Oxford, deserves honourable mention as the founder of the celebrated series of Lectures which bear his name. He gave his lands and estates to the University of Oxford, upon trust, for the endowment of Eight Divinity Lecture-Sermons, to be delivered annually: the subjects, To confirm and establish the Christian Faith, and to confute all heretics and schismatics upon the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures: The authority of the writings of the Primitive Fathers as to the faith and practice of the primitive Church: The Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: The Divinity of the Holy Ghost: The articles of the Christian Faith as comprehended in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds. Bancroft, George. Trans. of the Answer of the Preacher's at Basle respecting the Administration of the Lord's Supper, 1548-49, 8vo.

Bancroft, George, b. 1800, in Worcester, Mass., is a son of the Rev. Aaron Bancroft, D.D., author of a Life of Washington. (See ante.) He entered Harvard College at the early age of 13, and graduated with the second honours of his class in 1817. In 1818 he visited Germany, where he prosecuted his studies under the eminent scholars Heeren and Schlosser. His original destination was the pulpit, and he preached several discourses, which produced a favourable opinion of his talents in this department; but a love of literature proved the stronger attachment. For a short period he held the post of Greek Tutor in Harvard College. His first publication was a volume of Poems, (1823,) followed in the next year by a translation of Heeren's Reflections on the Politics of Ancient Greece. Shortly before this, in conjunction with Dr. Joseph G. Cogswell, (now superintendent of the Astor Library,) he opened the Round Hill School at Northampton, and in the intervals of instruction he occupied himself in supervising and publishing a translation of Heeren's Histories of the States of Antiquity and of the Political System of Europe and its Colonies from the Discovery of America to the Successful Termination of the Struggle for Freedom of the British Colonies. Mr. Bancroft now turned his attention to politics, in which field he displayed considerable ability. In January, 1838, he was appointed, by President Van Buren, Collector of the Port of Boston, and discharged the duties of this office with great fidelity for three years. In 1844 he was the candidate of the Democratic party for the office of Governor of the State of Massachusetts, and received a large vote, though not elected. In 1845, Mr. Bancroft was appointed Secretary of the Navy, and proved a most useful public officer: he suggested many reforms, established the Nautical School at Annapolis, and improved the Astronomical Observatory at Washington. In 1846, he was appointed minister-plenipotentiary to Great Britain, and resided in London until 1849, receiving those gratifying testimonials of esteem and respect which were official position is unable to command. On his return to America he adopted the city of New York as his residence. Some of his orations have been published; and he is the author of several articles in the North American and Boston Quarterly Reviews. He printed a Fourth-of-July Oration in 1826, delivered at the request of the town of Northampton; and, in 1836, an oration delivered at Springfield was published, and went through several editions.

As an author, Mr. Bancroft is best known by his History of the United States, the first part of which, embracing the History of the Colonization of the United States, is comprised in three volumes: 1st, pub. 1834; 2d, 1837; 3d, 1840. Vol. iv., being vol. i. of the History of the Revolution, was pub. in 1852, and vol. v. in 1853. The first portion of this work contains an account of the settlement of the 13 original states, the Spanish settlements in Florida, the French discovery, and colonization of Michigan and Wisconsin; the discovery of the Mississippi, the colonization of Illinois and Indiana, of Mississippi and Louisiana, and the attempts at colonising Texas by La Salle. The topics

"Most interesting to the people of the great Valley of the Mississippi, are delineated more fully than in any American work, and from original sources; the work is richly illustrated by maps, sketches, and engravings, particularly by heads of the Winthrop, of Smith, of William Penn, and Franklin; the smiles of the maps of the Valley of the Mississippi, and of Lake Superior, with sketches illustrating Indian life and appearance."

"The History of the United States is a work of great research, and, while the author states his own opinions decidedly and strongly, it is pervaded by a fair and just spirit. The style is vigorous, clear, and frank,—not often rising into eloquence, but frequently picturesque, and always free from imitation and from pedantry: it is, in fact, what it professes to be,—a national work,—and is worthy of its great theme."—Knight's Eng. Cyc.

So great has been the demand for this work, that the 15th edition of the first 3 vols. was published in 1853.

We quote some notices of the History of the Colonization of the United States, comprising vols. i., ii., and iii. The commendation of the author's distinguished friend and quondam tutor, Professor Heeren, must have been very gratifying to Mr. Bancroft:

"We know few modern historic works in which the author has reached so high an elevation at once as an historical inquirer and an historical writer. The great conscientiousness with which he refers to his authorities, and his careful criticism, give the most decisive proofs of his comprehensive studies. He has founded his narrative on contemporary documents, yet without neglecting works of later times, and of other countries. His narrative is everywhere worthy of the subject. The reader is always instructed, often more deeply interested than by novels or romances. The love of country is the muse which inspires the author; but this inspiration is that of the severe historian, which springs from the heart."—PROF. HEEREN.

The value of this opinion is well known to the student of history. Edward Everett justly remarks that "Few writers have better succeeded than Mr. Heeren in treating questions of antiquity with the spirit of modern philosophical criticism. He is a prudent mediator between the bold speculations of some of his countrymen, and the credulous learning of the last century. . . . Mr. Heeren holds a place in the front rank of the professors at Göttingen, is one of the most esteemed German writers of the present day, is a correspondent of the National Institute of France, and worthy of the fame which he enjoys at home and abroad."—North American Review.

Laudari a viro laudato Mr. Bancroft must feel to be a sufficient reward for his arduous labours.

Frederick Von Raumer does not scruple to say that "Bancroft, Prescott, and Sparks have effected so much in historical composition, that no living European historian can take precedence of them, but rather might feel proud and grateful to be admitted as a companion."

As we have quoted Mr. Everett, this seems to be a proper place for a short extract from this distinguished scholar's review of Mr. Bancroft's 1st volume:

"A History of the United States, by an American writer, possesses a claim upon our attention of the strongest character. It would do so under any circumstances; but when we add that the work of Mr. Bancroft is one of the ablest of the class which has for years appeared in the English language; that it compares advantageously with the standard British historians; that as far as it goes, it does such justice to its noble subject as to supersede the necessity of any future work of the same kind; and if completed as commenced, will unquestionably forever be regarded both as an American and as an English classic, our readers would justly think us unpardonable if we failed to offer our humble tribute to its merit."—N. American Review, xl. 99.

On another occasion Mr. Everett remarks:

"This noble theme has been treated with a beauty and a power by one whom I need not name in this presence, (the historian of the United States,) which, without impairing their authenticity, have converted the several pages of our history into a magnificent Odyssæy of national adventure."—Everett's Lecture on the Discovery of America.

The 3d volume was reviewed by a brother historian, W. H. Prescott:

"In closing our remarks we must confess our satisfaction, that the favourable notice we took of Mr. Bancroft's labours, on his first appearance, has been fully ratified by his countrymen, and that his Colonial History establishes his title to a place among the great historical writers of the age. The reader will find the pages of the present volume filled with matter not less interesting and important than the preceding. He will meet with the same brilliant and daring style, the same picturesque sketches of character and incident, the same acute reasoning, and compass of erudition."—N. American Review, iii. 75.

The Edinburgh Review, in concluding a notice of the 3 vols., (9th edition, Boston, 1841,) remarks:

"We cannot take leave of this work without again enforcing upon the mind of the English reader the necessity of perusing it with a catholic spirit. All that is of chief importance in it is entitled to his esteem. The real liberality,—the general fairness,—the labour and conscientious research it evinces,—deserve, and we are assured will receive, his warmest approbation. There are some peculiarities, however, of style,—some modes of expression,—some habits of thought, which are novel; and may, perhaps, not prove entirely grateful to our classic taste. But Mr. Bancroft is an American, not an English, production, and must be judged by a reference to American feelings. We treat a German or a French work after this fashion,—and this one, although written in our language, is not subject to our conventional criticism."—Vol. lxxv. 115.

The democratic animus, thus hinted at, has not been unnoticed at home. Dr. Griswold, while highly commending the History as a whole, observes:

"Entering deeply into the spirit of the times, he becomes insensibly the advocate of the cause of freedom, which invalidates his testimony. He suffers too much 'his passion to instruct his reason.' He is more mastered by his subject than himself master of it. Liberty with him is not the result of an analytical process, but the basis of his work, and he builds upon it synthetically."—Prose Writers of America, 4th ed. 1852, 405. (Notice of vols. i.-iii.)

See also, to the same effect, N. Amer. Rev., lxxiv. 426, (by Rev. G. E. Ellis.) The London Monthly Review speaks with enthusiasm both of the author and his theme:

"Mr. Bancroft, who is an American himself, possesses the best qualities of an historian. His diligent research, his earnest yet tolerant spirit, and the sustained accuracy and dignity of his style, have been nobly brought to bear upon one of the grandest subjects that ever engaged the study of the philosopher, the legislator, or the historian. There can be no doubt of his being possessed of the highest requisites of an historian."

Whilst there are many on this side of the Atlantic who would not feel disposed to endorse without reservation the following imprimatur, the literary competency of the historian will be questioned by few:

"Bancroft is the acknowledged historian of the United States. To him has been awarded by universal consent the task of making the record of our nation's life, with a confidence in his ripe scholarship, extensive historical knowledge, just discrimination, and the purity of his style, that has in no respect been disappointed. His work is, and must be, the standard history of the country, and as such should reach every family, and be studied by every person who would be acquainted with the events of our past existence."

We have stated that vol. 4th, being vol. 1st of the History of the American Revolution, was published in 1852. It comprises a period of 16 years, from 1748 to 1763, and is styled The American Revolution; Epoch First, the Overthrow of the European Colonial System. For the preparation of this volume Mr. Bancroft had a large stock of valuable materials never before used—

"Particularly the original, unpublished Journal of the Committee of Correspondence of Massachusetts; letters from public committees, from places as far south as Savannah, most of them unpublished, and never read by any writer of American history; and letters from almost every town and village in Massachusetts, from very many in Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Connecticut; unpublished letters, giving the history of the periods from 1766 to 1776, from Samuel Adams, Benjamin Franklin, as agent for Massachusetts, John Adams, Richard Henry Lee, Arthur Lee, William Lee, Christopher Gadsden; from Charles Thompson, Dickinson, and many others; a large file of most valuable letters from Joseph Warren; beside letters from William Prescott, Josiah Quincy, Jr., John Hancock, Gerry, Hawley, Dr. Cooper, and other leading characters in New England."

From such materials and so skilful an architect, much was expected, and expectation was not disappointed.

"It commences with a preliminary survey of the events that had prepared the inhabitants of the American Continent for the brilliant destiny that was to open before them, and is continued through a period of fifteen momentous years, embracing the seven years' war, the expulsion of the French from Canada, and the first contests of the people with their governors in the attempt of the latter to subvert their liberties. It describes minutely the progress of each event that tended toward the general result,—now sketching with a vigorous hand the reckless management of the 'Board of Trade,' in their endeavours for the enforcement of arbitrary power; then again, holding up to our admiring view the great Pitt, with his masterly genius stemming the storm which was almost ready to break over Europe, and raising his country to the highest pinnacle of greatness by his consummate statesmanship. The work is full of such artistic groupings, and rises at times to the highest point of eloquence. But yet it is not uniform, and sometimes sinks almost to mediocrity. In fact, we have seldom read a more uneven book,—some of its chapters, by their extreme terseness of style, rendering you weary, and others carrying you along with restless interest."—Norton's N.Y. Lit. Gazette.

Vol. 5th appeared in 1853. It comprises a period of three years, 1763-1766, and gives a history of the causes of dispute between Great Britain and her American Colonies. The enforcement of the Navigation Act, the passage of the Stamp Act, the Pontiac War, the Rockingham Ministry, the temper with which the Stamp Act was received in the Colonies, and its bold rejection by the first American Congress, the advocacy of the Colonial cause on the floor of Parliament by the first man in England—the great Pitt—the Repeal of the Stamp Act, and the other exciting events of this period are drawn by the hand of a master.

"The further this work proceeds, the more do we feel that it must take its place as an essentially satisfactory History of the United States."—London Athenæum.

We quote some more notices of Mr. Bancroft's History, as a whole:

"Aside from its artistic excellence, its remarkable unity, brilliant narrative, and vivid description, the whole work is full of facts that can be found nowhere else; for no one has had at command richer or more costly materials, or has brought to them greater ability or more persevering industry."

"There are more graceful narrators than Bancroft. There may be annalists more searching and profound—though we can scarcely name them—but for union of history and philosophy, the actual and the ideal, in a continuous synthetic composition, he certainly bears away the palm. . . . Mr. Bancroft's narrative is distinguished for its freedom from vagueness, and its exact nicety of description. In the sphere of facts, he deals in no unmeaning generalities. Whether delineating character or natural scenery, his epithets are choice, short-cut, and of expressive fidelity. He never falls into the error, so common with inferior writers, of losing all distinctness of statement in a cloud of general assertions. He is always specific in his detail, instead of trusting to indefinite sketches. He does not paint in uncertain colours the localities which he wishes to illustrate, but presents their natural features in prominent relief."—Geo. Ripley.

"At once a philosopher, a poet, a statesman, and an assiduous student, it is not surprising that he has produced a monument of genius and toil which embodies the highest attributes of the intellect, and will challenge the admiration of ages."—New York Quarterly Review.

"Among the historians who have attained a high and deserved reputation in the United States, within the last few years, we are inclined to yield the first place to George Bancroft."

"His experience in political and diplomatic life, no less than his rare and generous culture, and his singular union of the highest mental faculties, enable us to predict with confidence that his work will be reckoned among the genuine masterpieces of historical genius."—Westminster Review.

Vol. vi., pub. 1854, comprises the history of eight years, —1766-74,—bringing us down to the very verge of the Revolution. It has received the high commendation of being "in no respect inferior to its predecessors." In 1858 appeared revised eds. of vols. i. and ii., and in the same year was pub. vol. vii.,—being vol. i. of the American Revolution.

"This volume, while it forms the Continuation of the History as already published, is the first of four volumes embracing the period of the American Revolution,—from the Blockade of Boston to the Treaty of Peace at Paris, in 1782,—and contains (in a great degree from manuscripts and unpublished sources) the history of the nation during the first portion of this eventful period,—including the blockade of Boston Harbor, the general organization of the country, the alteration of the Charter of Massachusetts, the resistance of the people of Massachusetts, the spirit of the South, the Congress of 1774, the progress of measures in England, France, and elsewhere, the battles of Lexington and Concord, the siege of Boston, the Congress of 1775, the choice of Washington as commander-in-chief, the battle of Bunker Hill, &c."

"Having thus recognized the claims of the work in general terms, we may be allowed a critical word or two. In the first place, then, the absence of references, notwithstanding the author's explanation, is a great defect. We have heard much of the original and unedited historic material in his possession, but fail to trace any striking evidence thereof in the text. The ground over which he leads us is familiar and endeared: Marshall and Sparks, Ramsay and Gordon, Botta, Everett, and Frothingham, Irving, Loaming, and others, have been our guides in the same series of events; and we find little that is novel in the facts narrated by Mr. Bancroft. The prominence given to Samuel Adams, the details of public opinion and sentiment on both sides of the Atlantic, the sketches of European character, and many generalizations, philosophic and political, are the chief features of freshness; and these do not always add to the effect. Many of the longest quotations, though apt and illustrative, are household words to us all,—such as Lord Chatham's famous speech, Burke's description of the whale-fishery, Logan's aboriginal eloquence, and Patrick Henry's appeal."—H. T. TUCKERMAN. (Review of vol. vii., 1858.)

"In spite of all its partiality and all its shortcomings, Mr. Bancroft's work is a remarkable contribution to the history of that great and memorable revolution. Possibly, had he been less national he would have been less in earnest; and it is good to have an opportunity of seeing from all points of view."—Lon. Critic. (Review of vol. vii.)

"The opinion which we have more than once expressed upon the style of Mr. Bancroft's History applies with full force to the volume before us. It is exceedingly picturesque and bright and processional, yet scarcely equal to the vigour of debate or the storm of revolutionary battle. We have only glimpses of the men of the Revolution, and are left to a good deal of surmise as to the secrets of the time. We miss the authoritative notes that lighted up the text of the earlier volumes, and cannot but, on the whole, express our regret that the author has not had such complete access to papers as would have given fullness and certainty to this without doubt the only American National History."—Lon. Athen., June 12, 1848. (Review of vol. vii.)

"Mr. Bancroft, who was Ambassador to London in 1846-49, had the Government archives of England and France freely thrown open to him for the purposes of this history while thus engaged, and also was allowed free access to the private papers of the noble and political families in both countries whose ancestors had been mixed up in our contest. Well and wisely has he used them. We had occasion, when his sixth volume appeared, to go over it as critically as we could; and it is to the credit of his accuracy that we were able to discover only a single inaccuracy. That was where he committed tautology, by speaking of 'the county of Yorkshire.' Let us hope that the continuation of this national work will be pushed forward with some rapidity. Nearly four years have elapsed between the appearance of the two last volumes. Mr. Bancroft describes battles as well as Sir William Napier, who fought them."—DR. R. SHELTON MACKENZIE.

Mr. B. pub. an Abridg. of his Hist. of the Colonization of the U. States, 2 vols. 16mo, out of print, and not republished. In 1855, a vol. of his Miscellanies was pub., N. York, 8vo, and has passed through several edit.

Bancroft, John. Sertorius; a Tragedy, Lon., 1679.

Bancroft, Richard, 1544-1610, Archbishop of Canterbury, was a native of Farnsworth in Lancashire. He took the degree of B.A. at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1567, and then removed to Jesus College. He was in favour with Queen Elizabeth, whom he attended in her last illness. She nominated him to the see of London, and King James in 1604, promoted him to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. He was a zealous opponent of the Puritans, and Clarendon thinks that had his life been prolonged, he would have succeeded in destroying that formidable power which after his death swallowed up both the Church and the Monarchy. On the 12th of January, 1588, he preached a sermon at St. Paul's Cross, in which he handled the Puritans with great severity. See Hickeys's Bibliotheca Script. Eccles. Anglicane.

In 1593 he published, 1. Dangerous Positions and Proceedings published and practised within this Island of Britain, under pretence of Reformation and of the Presbyterian Discipline. 2. A Survey of the pretended Holy Discipline. These works "Were liked and greatly commended by the learnedest men in the realm."—WHITTERT.

Archbishop Bancroft was

"A person of singular courage and prudence in all matters relating to the discipline and establishment of the Church."—CAMDEN.

Bancroft, Thomas, b. probably about 1600, was educated at Catherine Hall, Cambridge. Two Bookes of Epigrammes and Epitaphs. Dedicated to two top branches of Gentry: Sir Charles Shirley, Baronet, and William Davenport, Esq., London: printed by J. Okes, for Matthew Walbancke, and are to be sold at his shop in Grays-Inn-gate, 1639. This very rare volume contains 481 "Epigrammes and Epitaphs." Priced in Bibl. Anglo-Poet., £20. In the first Book occur two "Epigrammes" on Shakespeare: "Shooke thy Speare," seems to allude to his Crest, which was a Falcon supporting a Spear.

Bancroft was a contributor to Lachrymæ Musarum, 1650, in which his poem is thus inscribed:

"To the never-dying Memory of the noble Lord Hastings, &c., the meanest son of the Muses consecrates this Elegie."—Bibl. Anglo-Poetica.

See Dyce's account of James Shirley, the dramatist, for his lines to that author.

Glutton's Feavers. This was reprinted for the members of the Roxburghe Club, by J. D. Phelps, Esq. In the Restituta, vol. ii. p. 490-96, will be found 19 Epigrams from Bancroft's first work.

"These discourses manifest considerable abilities in their author. Their style and language are generally easy, accurate, and expressive. They discover sense and ingenuity, learning and criticism. The subjects of them are chiefly the truth of Christianity, and its peculiar doctrines."—Monthly Review, 1781.

Bangs, Nathan, D.D., b. 1778, at Stratford, Fairfield co., Connecticut, entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1801. 1. The Errors of Hopkinsianism. 2. Predestination Examined. 3. Reformer Reformed. 4. Life of the Rev. Freeborn Garretson. 5. History of Missions. 6. An Original Church of Christ. 7. Hist. of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 4 vols. 12mo. 8. Emancipation. 9. State Prospects and Responsibilities of the M. E. Church. 10. Letters on Sanctification. 11. Life of Arminius. Dr. Bangs has contributed largely to the periodical literature of his Church. By appointment of the Gen. Conference he assumed the duties of editorship of the Christian Advocate and Journal, and the oversight of all the books issued from the Church establishment. As editor of the Quarterly Review and of the Methodist Book Concern, he has been widely useful to the ecclesiastical connexion of which he is a member.—Men of the Time.

Banim, John, is the author of a number of highly popular novels. The Tales of the O'Hara Family, 1st and 2d series, 1825-26, excited a very strong interest in the public mind.

He was the author of the celebrated tragedy of Damon and Pythias. See Life, with Extracts from his Correspondence by Patrick John Murray, 12mo, 1857.

"The Ghost Hunter and his family, and the Mayor of Wind-Gap, and several other works, are proofs of Mr. Banim's remarkable talent of eliciting the interest and sympathies of his reader. Fault has been found with him on the ground that there is throughout the whole of his writings a sort of overstrained excitement, a wilful dwelling upon turbulent and unchastened passions, which, as it is a vice most incident to the workings of real genius, more especially of Irish genius, so perhaps it is one which meets with least mercy from well-behaved, prosaic people."—Westminster Review.

Banks, Henry, b. about 1757, d. 1835, was a great-grandson of Sir John Banks, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in the reign of Charles I. He was educated at Westminster, and Trinity College, Cambridge. He became M.P., 1780, and was an acting and useful Trustee of the British Museum. In 1818 he pub. The Civil and Constitutional History of Rome, from the foundation to the Age of Augustus. This work met with but little favour from the Quarterly Review. See Early History of Rome, vol. xxvii. 273: but audi alteram partem:

Others judge, from the register of his baptism, that he was born in Argyle street, London. In 1760 he entered a gentleman commoner at Christ Church, Oxford. After a voyage to Labrador and Newfoundland, in 1768, he sailed in the Endeavour with Captain Cook on his first circumnavigation of the world. "Never perhaps has the chair been filled with more honour to the individual, or more advantage to the interest of science. His time, his wealth, his influence, his talents, an incomparable library of science and art; knowledge and judgment to advise; affability to conciliate and encourage; generosity to assist; all, in short, of which he possessed, and it was all something either goodness or greatness, he made the patrimony of the studious and learned, not of his own country, but of the whole world."—*Lon. Bannatyne, George, 1645-1607, was the compiler of the celebrated MS. Corpus Poeticum Scotorum, now in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh. The MS. was for a long time preserved in the family of Mrs. Foulis, (Bannatyne's daughter.) In 1712 it came into the hands of the Hon. Wm. Carmichael of Stirling, brother to the Earl of Hyndford. In 1772 it was presented by the then earl to the Advocates' Library. Allen Ramsey drew the specimens in his Evergreen from this MS. Sir David Dalrymple, afterwards Lord Hailes, published a selection from it in 1770, 12mo. A reprint, Leeds, 1815, 200 copies on common paper, and 31 on coloured paper. Of Bannatyne we know but little. Sir Walter Scott remarks, (Diary)

"Wrought upon an introduction to the notices which have been recovered of George Bannatyne. . . They are very jejune, these same notices; a mere record of matters of business, putting forth and calling in sums of money, and such like. Yet it is a satisfaction to know that this great benefactor to the literature of Scotland had a prosperous life, and enjoyed the pleasures of domestic society, and in a time peculiarly perilous lived unmolested, and died in quiet."

The Memorials of George Bannatyne, 1545-1608, edited by Sir Walter Scott and D. Laing, Esq., was pub. in 1826: it is No. XXXI. of the works issued by the Bannatyne Club. This club was founded in 1823 by Sir Walter Scott, and he regularly presided over its meetings, from 1823 to 1831. It consisted originally of only 31 members; but as many persons of rank and literary distinction were anxious to become connected with it, in 1828 the number was increased to 100.

"The Bannatyne Club was a child of his own, and from first to last he took a most fatherly concern in all its proceedings. His practical sense dictated a direction of their funds widely different from what had been adopted by the Roxburghs. Their club-books already constitute a very curious and valuable library of Scottish history and antiquities: their example has been followed with not inferior success by the Maitland Club of Glasgow—which was soon afterwards instituted on a similar model, and of which, also, Sir Walter Scott was a zealous associate;—and since his death a third club of this class, founded at Edinburgh in his honour, and styled the Abbotsford Club, has taken a still wider range;—not confining their printing to works connected with Scotland, but admitting all materials that can throw light on the ancient history or literature of any country, anywhere described or discussed by the author of Waverley."—Lockhart's Life of Scott.

Sir Walter's hope expressed in his Diary—"I hope the Bannatyne Club will be really useful and creditable,"—has been amply fulfilled: Q. E. D. by the list of its publications recorded in "Hume's Learned Societies and Printing Clubs." We have a noble specimen of its press now before us;—the Catalogue of the Library at Abbotsford, presented to the President and Members by Major Sir Walter Scott, (December, 1838.) This grand catalogue was compiled by that able bibliographer, Mr. Cochrane, of the London Library.

"In some instances Sir Walter's MS. notes to the various books have been extracted, but there are numberless references to his works where the books have been used or quoted."

Think of that, thou non-possessor, and weep! Thrice happy may that man deem himself who can "number in his list" of BIBLIOGRAPHY a copy of the ABBOTSFORD CATALOGUE! And here we have it, "sub oculis manibusque!"

"Bo-peep, what have we spied?"

This author, unfortunate in having lived in such evil days, has affixed no date to his ill-natured Satire against the ladies. Perhaps he was an unworthy, and, therefore, justly rejected, suitor, and revenged himself by this wholesale attack on the sex. This is supposed to have been written circa 1540.

Barbauld, Anna Letitia, 1743-1825, was born at Kibworth, Leicester, where her father, the Rev. John Aikin, LL.D., a Dissenting minister, was master of an excellent academy. See the memoir of her brother, Dr. John Aikin, in this volume. She gave early indications of uncommon powers of mind, which were cultivated by a thorough English and classical education. In 1773 she was persuaded to publish a volume of miscellaneous poems, which was so well received that four editions were issued within the year. In the same year her brother and herself published a volume of Miscellaneous Pieces in Prose. In 1774 she was married to the Rev. Rochemont Barbauld, a Dissenting minister, descended from a family of French Protestants. The newly-married pair opened a school at the village of Palgrave, and Mrs. Barbauld's literary fame, and her devotion to the duties of instruction, soon secured celebrity and success to the academy. Her Early Lessons for Children, and Hymns in Prose for Children, proved useful, not only to her own pupils, but also to many thousands who have lived to carry out the excellent principles inculcated by these invaluable manuals for the young. In 1775 appeared her Devotional Pieces, composed from the Psalms and the Book of Job.

"The author of the thoughts prefixed to these Devotional Pieces hath employed her able and masterly pen to show that a devotional spirit is not beneath the attention of the most cultivated and philosophical spirits, or, in the expressive words which she has chosen for the motto of her work, that Praise is devotion fit for mighty minds.

... Before we take our leave of this ingenious production, the author will pardon us if we express a wish that she would not suffer herself to be so enamored of David's harp, as entirely to lay aside her own charming lyre."—Lon. Monthly Review, 1785.

In 1785 Mr. and Mrs. Barbauld, finding repose necessary, gave up their school, and visited Switzerland and France, where they remained for nearly a twelvemonth. In 1790 Mrs. Barbauld published A Poetical Epistle to Mr. Wilberforce, on the Rejection of the Bill for Abolishing the Slave Trade. In 1792 appeared Remarks on Gilbert Wakefield's Inquiry into the Expediency and Propriety of Public and Social Worship.

Evenings at Home, the joint production of Mrs. Barbauld and her brother, Dr. John Aikin, was commenced in 1792, and completed in 1795, in 6 vols. In this excellent work Mrs. Barbauld's share was not considerable. It is said that not more than one-twelfth of the whole was contributed by her pen. See more respecting Evenings at Home in memoir of Dr. John Aikin.

In 1802 Mr. Barbauld became pastor of a congregation at Newington-Green, and a resident of the village of Stoke-Newington. Mrs. Barbauld pub., in 1804, Selections from the Spectator, Tatler, Guardian, and Freeholder. In the same year she contributed a Life of Samuel Richardson to his Correspondence. In 1808 she was called to mourn the death of her husband, who had given up the exercise of his ministerial duties two years previously. In 1810 she edited a series of the British Novelist, pub. in 50 vols. The Female Spectator appeared in 1811; and in the next year was pub. Eighteen Hundred and Eleven, a Poem of a political character, and any thing but cheerful in its tone.

This excellent lady lived to the advanced age of 82. An edition of her works was published in two volumes after her death, with a memoir of the authoress, by her niece Lucy, daughter of Dr. John Aikin, herself a writer of considerable note. Mrs. Barbauld's imitation of Dr. Johnson, in her Essays on Romance, was thus noticed by the doctor himself:

"The imitations of my style have not hit it. Miss Aikin has done it the best; for she has imitated the sentiments as well as the diction."—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

We find another reference by the Doctor to Miss Aikin: "Too much is expected from precocity, and too little performed. Miss Aikin was an instance of early cultivation, but in what did it terminate? In marrying a little Presbyterian parson, who keeps an infant boarding-school, so that all her employment now is "To suckle fools, and chronicle small beer."

She tells the children, "This is a cat, and that is a dog, with four legs and a tail; see there! you are much better than a cat or a dog, for you can speak." If I had bestowed such an education on a daughter, and had discovered that she thought of marrying such a fellow, I would have sent her to the Congress."

Nemo mortalium omnibus horis sapit; and this is one of the many very foolish speeches of a very wise man. Could the highly-educated young lady have been better employed than in promoting the mental, moral, and religious improvement of those who were in a few years to influence society so greatly for good or for evil?

"Her earliest pieces, as well as her more recent ones, exhibit in their imagery and allusions the fruits of extensive and varied reading. In youth the power of her imagination was counterbalanced by the activity of her intellect, which exercised itself in rapid but not unprofitable excursions over almost every field of knowledge. In age, when this activity abated, imagination appeared to exert over her an undiminished sway."—LUCK AIKIN.

"To claim for Mrs. Barbauld the praise of purity and elevation of mind, might well appear superfluous. She is decidedly one of the most eminent female writers which England has produced; and both in prose and poetry she takes the highest rank. Her prose style is easy and graceful, alike calculated to engage the most common and the most elevated understanding."—C. D. CLEVELAND.

Of her songs, Charles James Fox is said to have been a warm admirer.

"The moral qualities of this admirable woman reflected back a double lustre on her intellectual endowments. Her principles were pure and exalted, her sentiments on all occasions mild, candid, and generous. . . . Her society was equally a benefit and a delight to all within her sphere. She possessed many and warm friends, and passed through a long life without an enemy."—Lon. Gent. Mag., 1825.

Barbour, Barber, Barbere, or Barbar, John, Archdeacon of Aberdeen, d. 1396, is one of the earliest Scottish poets and historians. The date (1316–20–26–30?) and place of his birth are involved in obscurity: both have excited much controversy: (see the dissertations of Irving, Pinkerton, Henry, Jamieson, Warton, Lord Hailes, &c.) The only production of his extant may be entitled a national work: it is called The Bruce, and is a metrical chronicle of the warlike deeds of Robert the First (1306–1329) in his efforts for the independence of his beloved country. Dr. Henry is of opinion that this work was undertaken at the request of David II., the son and successor of Barbour's hero; but of this we have no evidence. Barbour appears to have composed another book, most probably in rhyme, in which a genealogical history of the Kings of Scotland was set forth, and their origin deduced from the Trojan Colony of Brutus. To this work, apparently the same which is quoted by the Prior of Lochleven, under the title of the Brute, we find references in Winton's Chronicle:

"Fra quham BARBERS sutely
Has made a propyr Geneology,
Tyl Robert our secownd kyng,
That Scotland had in governing."

"Of Brutus lynage quha wyll her,
He luk the tretis of BARBERS,
Mad in-tyl a Geneology
Rycht wele, and mare perfitly
Than I can on ony wys
Wyth all my wryt to yowe dewys."

Editions of The Bruce were pub. in 1616, 1648, 1655, 1670, 1671, 1672, 1737, 1758, &c., in all, it is said, 20 editions have been pub. in Scotland since 1616. In 1790 Mr. Pinkerton pub. an edition in 3 vols.; and in 1820 Dr. Jamieson pub. one in 2 vols., with a Life of the Author prefixed. Warton notices Barbour and Henry the Minstrel in these terms:

"Although this work is professedly confined to England, yet I cannot pass over two Scotch poets of this period, who have adorned the English language by a strain of verification, expression, and poetical imagery far superior to their age; and who, consequently, deserve to be mentioned in a general review of the progress of our national poetry."—History of English Poetry, vol. II.

The historian had some claim to include Barbour in his worthies, as his is one of the eminent names that adorn the proud scroll of Oxford. In 1357 a safe-conduct was granted by Edward III. of England, by request of David II. of Scotland, to "John Barber, Archdeacon of Aberdeen, with three scholars in his company, coming [into England] in order to study in the University of Oxford, and perform his scholastic exercises." We need not inform the scholar conversant with literary history, that it is still a mooted point what we are to understand by this phraseology: our own opinion is that the safe-conduct of 1357 can be easily interpreted by the aid of a similar document of 1364, and the one which refers to France, dated 1368. But we have no space for the discussion of "mooted points;" therefore must hasten on.

"Barbour seems to have been acquainted with those finer springs of the human heart which elude vulgar observation: he catches the shades of character with a delicate eye, and sometimes presents us with instances of nice discrimination. His work is not a mere narrative of events; it contains specimens of that minute and skilful delineation which marks the hand of a poet."—Dr. Irving's Lives of the Scottish Poets.

Mr. Pinkerton speaks of Barbour in no measured terms of commendation:

"Perhaps the editor may be accused of nationality, when he says, that, taking the total merits of this work together, he prefers it to the early exertions of even the Italian muse, to the melancholy sublimity of Dante, and the amorous quaintness of Petrarca, as much as M. Le Grand does a fabliau to a Provençal ditty. Here indeed the reader will find few of the graces of fine poetry. Little of the attic dress of the muse; but here are life and spirit, and ease and plain sense, and pictures of real manners, and perpetual incident and entertainment. The language is remarkably good for the time, and far superior in neatness and elegance even to that of Gawin Douglas, who wrote more than a century after."—Preface to Barbour.

With regard to the language of The Bruce, it is certainly "very remarkable that Barbour, who was contemporary with Gower and Chaucer, is more intelligible to a modern reader than either of these English poets."

"Our archdeacon was not only famous for his extensive knowledge in the philosophy and divinity of those times, but still more admired for his admirable genius for English poetry: in which he composed a history of the life and glorious actions of Robert Bruce... A work not only remarkable for a copious circumstantial detail of the exploits of that illustrious prince, and his brave companions in arms, Randolph, Earl of Moray, and the Lord James Douglas, but also for the beauty of its style, which is not inferior to that of his contemporary, Chaucer."—Henry's History of Great Britain: Mackenzie's Lives.

Dr. Nott, also, speaks of the resemblance to Chaucer:

"He had given to his countrymen a fine example of the simple, energetic style, which resembled Chaucer's best manner, and wanted little to make it the genuine language of poetry."—Disc. on the State of English Poetry, &c.

But Mr. Spalding does not set quite so high an estimate on the Archdeacon's poetry:

"If we were to compare it with the contemporary poetry of England, its place would be very high; Chaucer being set aside as unapproachable, Barbour must be pronounced much superior to Gower, and still more so to the anonymous writers of the very best of the metrical romances."—History of English Literature.

"Sir Walter Scott, whose 'Lord of the Isles' owes much to 'The Bruce,' and might profitably be compared with it, has not forgotten one of the finest of those passages in which we are told how the king, pursued by a superior force, ordered his band to turn and meet the enemy, rather than abandon to them a poor woman who had been seized with illness."—Ibid.

See a letter from Sir Walter Scott to George Ellis, May 26, 1805:

"If you will turn to Barbour's Bruce, (Pinkerton's edition, p. 66,) you will find that the Lord of Lorn, seeing Bruce covering the retreat of his followers, compares him to Gow Mac Morn, (Macpherson's Gaul, the son of Morni.) This similitude appears to Barbour a disparagement."—Lockhart's Life of Scott.

He wrote the Lives of Kings Henry II. and John, in Speed's History of England; and was author of a Preface to Crakanthorpe's Defensio Ecclesie Anglicane, Lon., 1625. But the most remarkable fact in his literary history is his authorship of The Display of Heraldry, Lon., 1610, bearing the name of John Guillim. Anthony Wood, after remarking that this book was "much used by Novices, and the best in that kind that ever before was published," proceeds—

"This book being mostly composed in his younger years, he deemed it too light a subject for him to own, being then (when published) a grave Divine, Chapl. to an Archbishop, and not unlikely a Dean. Whereupon, being well acquainted with John Guillim, an Officer of Arms, he gave him the copy, who, adding some trivial things to it, published it, with leave from the author, under his own name, and it goeth to this day under the name of Guillim's Heraldry. He also wrote a book concerning coins in MS., but where it is now I know not. Sure I am that he had the best Collection of Coins of any Clergyman in England, which being given by him to Dr. Laud, Archb. of Cant., (who much desired them), they came soon after, by his gift, to Bodley's Library, and are at this day reposed in the Gallery adjoining."—Athen. Oxon.

Fuller also refers to his coin-collecting propensity: "He was a greater lover of coins than of money; rather curious in the stamps than covetous for the metal thereof."—Worthies.

"A garner filled with the most amusing and best histories and little narrations, told in the author's own words, and occasionally enlarged, but in perfect keeping and consistency. . . . It purports to be an ethical treatise on human happiness, consisting of six books. In the first, the author offers to prove, and by example to show, that felicity consists not in pleasure;—in the second, not in riches;—in the third, not in honour and glory;—in the fourth, not in moral virtue, after the academicks and peripateticks, nor in philosophical contemplation;—in the fifth, he declares his own opinion of the happiness of this life;—and in the sixth, he shows wherein consiste the true felicity and Summum Bonum of man, and the way to attain it."—Retrospective Review, vol. I. 271. Read this interesting article, which contains extracts.

The good knight, after considering the disappointment to which those are subjected who are still anxiously inquiring—"who will show us any good?"—comes to a conclusion which we trust each one of our readers will endorse.

"To worship and glorifie God in this life, that we may be joined to him in the world to come, is our beatitude, or Summum Bonum."

Barclay, Barclay, Barklay, or de Barklay, Alexander, d. 1552, at an advanced age, is supposed by Wood to have been a native of Somersetshire, or its vicinity; Warton assigns him to Gloucestershire, or Devonshire; Bale and Pits are of opinion that he was from north of the Tweed, and Dr. Bulleyn declares he was a Scotchman. In 1495 we find him of Oriel College, Oxford. He was first a priest of the college of St. Mary Ottery, in Devonshire; secondly, of the order of St. Benedict; thirdly, of the order of St. Francis. After the dissolution of the monastery of Ely, he became vicar of Wokey, in Somersetshire, was afterwards translated to Baddow Magna in Essex; and lastly was presented to the vicarage of All Saints, Lombard Street, on April 30, 1552; a few weeks after which, he died.

The principal work in which Barclay was concerned is one of the very mention of which excites the enthusiasm of the true Bibliomaniac. It is entitled THE SHYP OF FOLYS OF THE WORLD, and was printed by Pynson, in 1509. It is founded upon the original work of this name, of Sebastian Brandt—a German satire upon the follies of all ranks—and upon the French and Latin translation thereof. Barclay's poem is in the balade, or octave, stanza: we give an extract which is as severe a satire on the ignorant book-collector as the invective of Lucian, or the humour of La Bruyère:

The First Fool in the Ship is the Ignorant Bookworm: (loquitur):

"Lo in likewise of Bookes I have store,
But few I reade, and fewer understands;
I folowe not their doctrine, nor their lore,
It is enough to bear a booke in hand:
It were too much to be in such a land,
For to be bounde to loke within the booke:
I am content on the fayre coveryng to looke. . . .
"Still am I busy bookes assembling,
For to have plenty it is a pleasant thing,
In my conceyt to have them ay in hand;
But what they meane do I not understande.
"But yet I have them in great reverence
And honour, saving them from filth and ordure;
By often brushing and much diligence:
Full goodly bounde in pleasant coverture
Of damas, sattin, or els of velvet pure:
I keepe them sure fearing lest they should be lost,
For in them is the cunning wherein I me boast.
"But if it fortune that any learned man
Within my house fall to disputation,
I drawe the curtaynes to shewe my bokes then,
That they of my cunning should make probation:
I love not to fall in altercation:

And while the common, my bookes I turne and winde,
For all is in them, and nothing in my minde."—Warton's History of Eng. Poetry; which see for a copious account of Barclay's writings.

"There are few books more interesting to the collector, than editions of the SHYP OF FOLYS, of which Pynson's has the distinguished honour of being the parent impression in our own country."

Vide Dibdin's edition of Ames, vol. ii. p. 431, where will be found a particular description of this rare volume, with specimens of the curious engravings on wood.

"All ancient satirical writings, even those of an inferior cast, have their merit, and deserve attention, as they transmit pictures of familiar manners, and preserve popular customs. In this light, at least, Barclay's Ship of Fools, which is a general satire on the times, will be found entertaining. Nor must it be denied, that his language is more cultivated than that of many of his contemporaries, and that he contributed his share to the improvement of the English phraseology. His author, Sebastian Brandt, appears to have been a man of universal erudition, and his work, for the most part, is a tissue of citations from the ancient poets and historians."—Warton.

Barclay's abilities gained him great distinction, even in his life-time:

"He was admired for his wit and eloquence, and for a fluency of style not common in that age. This recommended him to many noble patrons. . . . That he was a polite writer, a great refiner of the English tongue, and left behind him many testimonies of his wit and learning, cannot be denied."

Bale treats his memory with great indignity, but Pits assures us that he was devoted to the promotion of religion and to personal improvement. THE SHYP OF FOLYS, especially Pynson's edition, 1509, is a very rare work. A copy in the Bibl. Anglo-Poet. is priced £105; Cawood's edition, 1570, £12 12s. De Worde printed an edition in 1517, translated by H. Watson into prose.

A Ryght frutefull treatyse intituled the Myrrour of good Manners. This is sine anno; printed by Pynson. It is a translation of a poem by Mancini, entitled De Quatuor Virtutibus. His Egloges were printed by Pynson, sine anno.

"Our author's Egloges, I believe, are the first that appeared in the English language. They are, like Petrarch's and Mantuan's, of the moral and satirical kind, and contain but few touches of rural description and bucolic imagery."—Warton.

Barclay, John, 1582–1621, son of William Barclay of Aberdeenshire, was born at Pont-à-Mousson. He was educated at the college of the Jesuits of his native place, and made such progress in his studies, that at the age of nineteen he is said to have published notes on the Thebais of Statius. He makes no secret of his thirst for distinction: "I had no sooner left school than the juvenile desire of fame incited me to attack the whole world, rather with a view of promoting my own reputation, than of dishonouring individuals."—Preface to the Apology for Euphormion.

In 1605 he visited England, where he remained about a year. Subsequently he resided there for several years. Upon the death of his father, in 1606, he went to Paris, where he married Louisa Debonnaire. His latter years were spent in Rome, amidst his books and flowers, displaying more wisdom in the Bibliomania than in the Tulip-mania, of which last disease he is supposed to have been one of the first victims. In his Euphormion he had pronounced the plant "Golden Rod" to be a specific for the stone, yet of this painful complaint he died in 1621.

In 1604 he pub. the first part of his Latin satire, Euphormion; the second part was pub. at Paris, and a complete edition at Amsterdam in 1629. This satire made so many enemies, that in 1610 he pub. his Apology for Euphormion. (See extract from the preface above.)

His account of the Gunpowder Plot (Barclay was always a zealous son of the Church of Rome) was pub. in 1606. For some verses referring to his poverty whilst in England, see Delit. Poet. Scot., i. 93-100. In 1611 he pub. his father's work, De Potestate Pape, a curious production for an adherent of the Church of Rome; as it lays down the positions, 1. That the pope has no power direct or indirect over sovereigns in temporals. 2. That they who allow him any such power, whatever they may intend, do very great prejudice to the Roman Catholic religion. This work was attacked by Cardinal Bellarmine, to whom Barclay responded in his J. Barclay Pietas, &c., Paris, 1612. He afterwards repented having written this work, as it displeased many of his own faith, and gratified those whom he esteemed heretics. As some reparation, it is supposed, he pub. in 1617 Parænesis ad Sectarios.

His Ion Animarum was pub. in 1614. It is a delineation of the genius and customs of the European nations, with remarks of a moral and philosophical cast on the peculiarities of mankind. In style it has been compared to Goldsmith's Traveller. Barclay's principal work, the Argenis, or the Loves of Poliarachus and Argenis, was first pub. in Paris in 1621, by means of the friendship of the celebrated antiquary, M. de Peiresc. The first English translation was pub. by Kingsmill Long, gent., in 1625, 4to. Of this there was a second edition, "beautified with pictures, together with a key prefixed to unlock the whole story," in 1636. There was also a translation in 1628 by Sir Robert Le Grys, "the verses by Thomas May," (the continuator of Lucan); this version is said to have been undertaken at the request of Charles I. In 1772 Clara Reeve pub. a translation under the title of The Phoenix, or the History of Polyarchus and Argenis. There are three French translations of The Argenis, 1624, 1732, 1736; and it was also rendered into the Italian, Spanish, and Dutch. The Argenis is a political allegory, a romance, and a system of politics:

"In it the various forms of government are investigated, the causes of faction detected, and the remedies pointed out for most of the evils that can arise in a state. . . . It affords such a variety of entertainment, that every kind of reader may find in it something suitable to his own taste and disposition: the statesman, the philosopher, the soldier, the lover, the citizen, the friend of mankind, each may gratify his favourite propensity, while the reader who comes for his amusement only, will not go away disappointed."—Preface to Clara Reeve's Translation.

The characters in the Argenis are intended to represent various distinguished personages in history and real life. Poliarachus is meant for Henry of Navarre; Aquilius is the Emperor of Germany; Calvin is Uesinulca; Radiobanes is the King of Spain, and Hyanisbe is thought to resemble in some traits Elizabeth of England. Richelieu was very fond of perusing this work, and it is thought from thence he drew many of his political maxims. Cowper pronounced it the most amusing romance ever written:

"It is interesting in a high degree; richer in incident than can be imagined, full of surprises, which the reader never foretells, and yet free from all entanglement and confusion. The style, too, appears to me to be such as would not dishonour Tacitus himself."—Cowper's Letter to Saml. Rose, Esq.

As to the style to which Cowper thus refers, Coleridge prefers it to that of Livy or Tacitus: (Remains, vol. I.) but Mr. Hallam remarks upon this:

"I cannot by any means go this length; it has struck me that the Latinity is more that of Petronius Arbiter, but I am not well enough acquainted with that writer to speak confidently. The same observation seems applicable to the Euphormion."—Introduct. to Lit. of Europe.

We may be permitted to remind classical critics of the recorded opinion of Grotius:

"Gente Caledonius, Gallus natalibus hic est, Romam Romano qui docet ore loqui."

"A Scot by blood,—and French by birth,—this man
At Rome speaks Latin as no Roman can."

Mr. Hallam well remarks that

"Barclay has mingled so much of mere fiction with his story, that no attempts at a regular key to the whole work can be successful, nor in fact does the fable of this romance run in any parallel stream with real events. His object seems in great measure to have been the discussion of political questions in disguised dialogue. But though in these we find no want of acuteness or good sense, they have not at present much novelty in our eyes; and though the style is really pleasing, or, as some have judged, excellent, and the incidents not ill-contrived, it might be hard to go entirely through a Latin romance of 700 pages, unless indeed we had no alternative given but the perusal of the similar works in Spanish or French."—Introduct. to Lit. of Europe.

The correctness of the opinion of this intelligent author is evinced by the general neglect into which this once popular allegory has now fallen.

"It absolutely distresses me, when I reflect that this work, admired as it has been by great men of all ages, (and lately by the poet Cowper), should be only not unknown to the general reader."—Coleridge.

Barclay, Robert, 1648-1690, the celebrated apologist for the doctrines and principles of the Society of "Friends," sometimes called "Quakers," was born at Gordonstoun, in Morayshire, December 23d. He was a descendant of a very "ancient and honourable family in Scotland, by his father's side, who was Colonel David Barclay, of Mathers, a man universally esteemed and beloved, and by his mother, Mrs. Catherine Gordon, daughter of Sir W. Gordon, from the noble house of Huntley; so that if his principles had not led him to slight the advantages of birth, few gentlemen could in that particular have gone beyond him." His father, who had held a commission in the Swedish army in Germany, where he rose to the rank of Major, and had also commanded in the Royalist army under Charles I., embraced Quakerism whilst confined in prison from political persecutions, in the year 1666.

Robert was sent to Paris at an early age, to complete his education, and placed under the care of his uncle, principal of the Scots' College. This relative was a zealous Roman Catholic, and Robert was naturally disposed to embrace a religion so favourably commended to his regard. His uncle was so anxious to retain him in Paris, where he could both enjoy his society, and preserve him from the baneful influence of heretical doctrines, that he offered to present him with a considerable fortune at once, and leave the balance of his property to him on his demise. It is not unlikely that Robert would have consented to these conditions, had not a summons from his father, who dreaded his becoming a convert to the Roman Church, recalled him home. With that regard to strict principle which was always a characteristic of Robert Barclay, he was not disobedient to the paternal command, but at once resigned the flattering prospects which had been held out to him, and returned to Scotland in 1664.

So great had been his application to his studies, that, although scarcely sixteen years of age, he possessed considerable knowledge of the sciences, and was skilled in the French and Latin tongues; the latter he wrote and spoke with facility and correctness; subsequently he attained Greek and Hebrew.

Many authors have told us that Colonel Barclay had become a convert to Quakerism (we use the term for convenience, and, of course, without any disrespect) before the return of Robert from France: but we have the testimony of Robert himself that his father did not join this sect until 1666. This date approaches so closely to that of the first promulgation of the doctrines of Quakerism, that a brief notice of the history of the society in Scotland for the first twenty years of its existence, may not be out of place. George Fox, born in 1624, (see Fox, GEORGE), became a public preacher of his religious tenets about the year of Robert Barclay's birth—1648. In 1657 he visited Scotland, and preached with such success, that large numbers, especially in the north, about Aberdeen and Elgin, became converts to the doctrines which he proclaimed. One of the most distinguished disciples was the celebrated John Swinton of Swinton, one of the most learned and accomplished men of his time, and so much in favour with Oliver Cromwell that it was notorious that the Protector "trusted him more than anybody, and almost every thing in Scotland was done by his advice." At the Restoration, Swinton and Barclay were imprisoned by the government, and by "long and frequent conversations" the latter was convinced by the former of the excellency of the doctrines preached by George Fox.

Colonel Barclay sought to impress the truth of his new opinions upon the mind of Robert, but for some time without success. He did not, however, refuse to place himself in the way of conviction, and, whilst attending a religious meeting of the society, he was so deeply impressed by a discourse of one of their ministers, that he felt it his duty to unite with the body. He became a most zealous propagator of his new tenets; and laboured with great success in England, and on the Continent, especially in Holland. He travelled with William Penn through the principal parts of England, Holland, and Germany. He was "everywhere received with respect, and dismissed with concern; for though his conversation as well as his manners were strictly suitable to his doctrine, yet there was such a spirit and liveliness in his discourse, and such a serenity and cheerfulness in his deportment, as rendered him extremely agreeable to all sorts of people."

Robert Barclay was no common character, either as respects natural capacity, extensive learning, indomitable energy, or persevering zeal. At an age when many young men are triflers of fashion, or slaves to vice, this noble youth girded up his loins, and went forth into the world to battle with sin, and promote the glory of God through the salvation of man. Born to prosperous fortunes, and of an illustrious line, the heir of the De Berkleys was willing, for the sake of truth and righteousness, to "eat his bread with scarceness," and to exchange the society of the great, and the lordly halls of nobles, for the "tender mercies" of a brutal jailer, the companionship of felons, and the untold horrors of the convict's cell. We can imagine few more affecting pictures than that which disgraced the year 1677, and the town of Aberdeen, when the aged Colonel Barclay, his son Robert, and a number of other Quakers, were cast into jail for the second time in a twelve-month. His father, who, to borrow the words of Croese, "was venerable in his appearance, just in all his actions, who had shewed his courage in the wars of Germany, and his fortitude in bearing all the hard usage he met with in Scotland with cheerfulness, as well as patience"—this good old man, now well stricken in years, but strong in conscious integrity, and supported by a noble zeal, was ready to go with his beloved child to prison and to death, rather than to deny his faith, or to hold his peace when he believed that his God bade him to "lift up his voice, and show the people their sins." Our worthy ancestors had what they esteemed a sovereign remedy for heresy. When any inquirer after truth was so hardy as to doubt their infallibility, they forthwith put him into the stocks, or immured him in the next jail, fed him with bread and water, and cropped off his ears, and, if he still continued obstinate, perhaps hung him at Tyburn, or burnt him at Smithfield. Who can doubt that such substantial evidences of the true Christian spirit of love, charity, and goodwill, were admirably calculated to convince all heretics of the evil of their own ways, and the orthodoxy of those who were so solicitous for their spiritual welfare? Robert Barclay had not long been united to the society of "Friends," when he commenced that powerful use of his pen on behalf of their doctrines, by which his name has been widely known to all succeeding generations.

His first work appeared in 1670:

"Truth cleared of Calumnies, wherein a book entitled, A Dialogue between a Quaker and a stable Christian, (printed at Aberdeen, and, upon good ground, judged to be writ by William Mitchell, a preacher near by to it, or, at least, that he had the chief hand in it,) is examined, and the Dis-ingenuity of the author in representing the Quakers is discovered: here is also their case truly stated, cleared, demonstrated, and the Objections of their Opposers answered according to Truth, Scripture, and Right Reason."

This hydra-headed treatise might well have alarmed the imprudent William Mitchell, who had little idea when preparing his Dialogue what sore punishment he was drawing down upon his own head. To use the significant phraseology of the author to the Preface of Barclay's works, (Lon., 1692,) this answer showed Barclay "to be much an overmatch for his antagonist." In this work

Barclay reviews the objections which had been urged against the doctrines of the Quakers.

"The business of this book is to shew they had been extravagantly abused by their adversaries, who sometimes would have them pass for people distracted, and, at other times, for men possessed of the devil, and practising abominations under pretence of being led to them by the Spirit; as denying the existence of Christ, the reality of a heaven and a hell, the being of angels, the resurrection of the body, and the day of judgment. He shews upon what slight pretence these notions were taken up, how consistent all the doctrines of the Quakers were with the gospel in respect to these points, and how unjust the persecution they had sustained for maintaining what the apostles maintained, the light of Christ Jesus shining in the mind of man."—Biog. Brit.

Some Things of Weighty Concernment, &c. This second treatise was an appendix to the first; in this he proposes twenty questions relating to those who had distinguished themselves in representing the Quakers in ridiculous lights,

"When if that kind of language had been allowed among this sort of people, they might themselves have been rendered far more ridiculous. These writings made Mr. W. Mitchell so uneasy, and rendered it so apparent that either he was in the wrong, or wanted abilities necessary to prove himself in the right, that he immediately had recourse again to the press, in order to return an answer to Robert Barclay, which produced our author's third book upon this subject, in which he effectually silenced that angry and impatient writer."

The preface to the third treatise—W. Mitchell unmasked, or the staggering infallibility of the pretended stable Christian discovered, &c.—is dated from Ury, our author's residence, December 24, 1671. In 1675 he published a work intended to explain and defend the doctrines and principles of the Quakers. This work is entitled

"A Catechism and Confession of Faith, approved of and agreed unto by the General Assembly of the Patriarchs, Prophets, and Apostles, Christ himself chief Speaker in and among them, which containeth a true and faithful Account of the Principles and Doctrines which are most surely believed by the Churches of Christ in Great Britain and Ireland, who are reproachfully called by the name of QUAKERS, yet are found in one Faith with the Primitive Church and Saints, as is most clearly demonstrated by some plain Scripture Testimonies, (without Consequences or Commentaries,) which are here collected and inserted by way of Answer to a few weighty, yet easy and familiar, Questions, fitted as well for the wisest and largest, as for the weakest and lowest Capacities. To which is added an Expostulation with an Appeal to all other Professors, by R. B., a Servant of the Church of Christ."

Our author seems to have determined that those who would not pursue their investigations further than his title-pages, should not even then escape wholesome instruction. The preface to this work is dated Urie, 1673. The author endeavours to prove that Quakerism is the perfection of Protestantism: that there is properly no middle ground between the doctrines he espouses, and those of the Church of Rome.

The Anarchy of the Ranters, &c., which has been praised as "a learned and excellent treatise, containing as much sound reason as any book of its size, in our, or perhaps in any modern, language," was published in 1676. Its object was to prove that the Quakers were not justly liable to the objections urged against the fanaticism of the Ranters. This work met with so much censure, that in 1679 he pub. a Vindication of it. He also gave to the world A True and Faithful Account of some of his disputes with some of the students of the University of Aberdeen; and in 1686 he pub. The Possibility and Necessity of the Inward and Immediate Revelation of the Spirit of God, towards the foundation and ground of true Faith, proved in a Letter written in Latin to a person of Quality in Holland, and now also put into English.

Like Bunyan, Sir Richard Baker, Boethius, Grotius, Buchanan, and many other good men, he made even the employment of his prison hours useful to his fellow-men. It was whilst in the jail of Aberdeen that he composed that "noble description of Christian Beneficence," Universal Love considered and established upon its right Foundation, being a serious Enquiry how far Charity may, and ought to extend towards Persons of different Judgments in matters of Religion, and whose Principles among the several Sects of Christians, do most naturally lead to that due Moderation required, writ in the Spirit of Love and Meekness for the removing of Stumbling-Blocks out of the Way of the Simple, by a Lover of the Souls of all Men, R. B. This work was written and pub. in 1677. The author divides his subject into five sections.

1st. He gives his own experience, and his reasons for writing this treatise.

2d. The nature of Christian Love and Charity is demonstrated.

3d. The controversy is stated with respect to the different religious bodies, &c.

4th. An examination of the principles held by many called Christians, and those principles proved to be defective.

5th. Some "principles of Christianity are proposed, as they are held by a great body of people, and some gathered churches in Great Britain and Ireland which do very well agree with true Universal Love."

Having thus noticed the other works of Robert Barclay, we are prepared to consider that by which he will always be best known, viz :

"An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the People called in Scorn, Quakers; being a full Explanation and Vindication of their Principles and Doctrines, by many Arguments deduced from Scripture and Right Reason, and the Testimonies of famous Authors, both Ancient and Modern, with a full Answer to the strongest Objections usually made against them: Presented to the King. Written and published in London, for the Information of Strangers, by ROBERT BARCLAY, and now put into our Language for the Benefit of his Countrymen," London, 1678.

The Address to Charles II. has been admired for clearness and vigour of style, and faithful boldness of exhortation. Was there ever a greater contrast than between the subject and the king? the selfish, dissolute, effeminate monarch, and the noble-hearted, self-sacrificing preacher of Universal Love? The Theses Theologicæ, which were the ground-work of the Apology, had been previously published and sent abroad in Latin, French, High and Low Dutch, and English, addressed to the Clergy of what sort soever,

"And that his candour, impartiality, and sincere love of truth, might be still more manifest, he sent them to the Doctors, Professors, and Students in Divinity, both Popish and Protestant, in every country throughout Europe, desiring they would seriously examine them, and send him their answers. As soon as the Apology was finished, he sent two copies of it to each of the public ministers, then at the famous Congress of Nimegue, where it was received with all imaginable favour and respect, and the knowledge, charity, and disinterested probity of its author justly applauded."

The Latin version, Theologicæ vere Christianæ Apologia, was pub. at Amsterdam in 1676; the English translation, as we have seen above, in 1678. Other English editions were published in 1701-36, a beautiful edition by Baskerville in 1765, another edition in 1780, and many since; besides Abridgments in 8vo. and 12mo. &c. Ant. de Alvarado translated it into Spanish in 1710; and translations have appeared in most of the European languages. The author pub. a Vindication of his work in 1679; incited thereto by an attack in Latin by John Brown upon the Latin version of the Apology. The Vindication was esteemed by William Penn, and many others, to be equal in every respect to the Apology.

Our author's doctrines, as contained in the Theses, and more largely expounded in the Apologia, were attacked by other writers also, viz.: Nicholas Arnoldus, Professor in the University of Franeker; John George Bajerus, Professor of Divinity at Jena, (who was answered by Geo. Keith, then a stout supporter of Quaker doctrines;) Christopher Holthusius, a famous preacher at Franckfort; George Keith, (the quondam advocate of the Apology,) in the Standard of the Quakers Examined, Lon., 1702; Ant. Keiser of Hamburg; Thomas Bennet, in a Confutation of Quakerism, 1705; Mr. Trenchard; Thos. Chubb, 1721; Wm. Notcutt, 1738; Daniel Gittins, 1758; S. Newton, 1771, &c.

As we have nothing to do in this place with the theological opinions of Barclay, or of his antagonists, we discharge our duty by enabling the reader to possess himself of the expositions of the views of both sides of the controversy.

Of the literary character of a theological, as of any other, work, it does become us to speak; and here we are very safe in assigning a distinguished place among the productions of the human mind to Barclay's Apology for the true Christian Divinity. Language of uncommon purity is made the powerful instrument of reasoning embellished with wit, and persuasion fortified by argument. To the merits of Barclay as a writer, we have, besides many others, the attestations of the learned Gerard Croese, Norris of Bemerton, Jeremiah Jones, Bennet, Trenchard, and Voltaire. The latter observes in his Letters on the English Nation, that the Apology is "as well executed as the subject would possibly admit." Norris of Bemerton, a very famous man in his day, remarks—

"I take him to be so great a man, that I profess freely, I had rather engage against an hundred Bellarmines, Hardings, and Stapletons, than with one Barclay."—Second Treatise of the Light within.

William Sewell speaks of him as "A man of eminent gifts and great endowments, expert not only in the languages of the learned, but also well versed in the writings of the ancient Fathers, and other ecclesiastical writers, and furnished with a great understanding, being not only of a sound judgment, but also strong in arguments."—Etis. of the Quakers.

Dr. Williams remarks:

"Barclay was a man of extraordinary abilities, and his work affords considerable information, not only concerning the peculiar tenets of the Quakers, but also on other subjects. His method and style are far superior to most of his contemporaries."

We could multiply testimonies, but this is needless.

As regards Barclay's personal character, his energy was evinced by his laborious and self-denying pilgrimages and ministrations; his benevolence by his burning zeal for the souls of his fellow-men; his patience and humility by the uncomplaining submission with which he "bore the loss of all things" for the advancement of what he deemed to be the truth.

"We sometimes travelled together," says his faithful friend and fellow-sufferer, William Penn, "both in this kingdom and in Holland, and some parts of Germany, and were inward in diverse services from first to last: and the apprehension I had of him was this, he loved the truth and way of God, as revealed among us, above all the world, and was not ashamed of it before men, but bold and able in maintaining it, sound in judgment, strong in argument, cheerful in travels and sufferings, of a pleasant disposition, yet solid, plain, and exemplary in his conversation. He was a learned man and a good Christian, an able Minister, a dutiful son, and a loving husband, a tender and careful father, an easy master, and a good and kind neighbour and friend."

With such a character we need not be surprised that it was his "Peculiar felicity to gain so entire a conquest over envy as to pass through life (and which is so much the more wonderful, such a life as his was) with almost universal applause, and without the least imputation on his integrity. The great business of his life was doing good, promoting what he thought to be the knowledge of God, and consequently the happiness of man."

For further information concerning this truly eminent, and—far higher commendation—truly excellent man, see the Biographia Britannica, to which this article is largely indebted; Sewell's History of the Quakers, Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History, Genealogical Account of the Barclays of Urie, &c.

Who would not have supposed that this touching appeal to the second Charles would have influenced even his selfish and vice-enraptured heart?

"Thou hast tasted of prosperity and adversity; thou knowest what it is to be banished thy native country, to be overruled, as well as to rule and sit upon the throne; and being oppressed, thou hast reason to know how hateful the oppressor is both to God and man."—Preface to the Apology.

Truly little cause had the poor Quaker in his prison to envy the ungodly monarch on his throne! Deeply grieved to witness the bold licentiousness which prevailed among the scoffing courtiers and their graceless king, he might well adopt the prayer, "O my soul, come not thou into their secret; into their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united!"

Towards the close of his life, Robert Barclay was in great favour at court; and had James II. been wise enough to profit by his advice in 1688, and make timely concessions to an outraged people, it is possible that the question of the "Succession" would never have tested the wisdom of the English parliament.

In 1682 Barclay was elected Governor of East Jersey by the proprietors.

"To induce him to accept of the office, he was made a joint proprietor, with a power of bestowing five thousand acres more, as he should think fit. Upon account of his peculiar merit, the government was to be held for life, though no other Governor was to be continued longer than three years. He had, likewise, a power of appointing a Deputy Governor, which he accordingly did."

Robert never came to America, but his brother John settled there, and his brother David, a youth of great promise, who had gone out with the same intention, died upon the voyage. "His brother John died at Amboy, in 1731, leaving two sons. His grandson, Alexander, was comptroller of the customs in Philadelphia, and died in 1771." A Scottish poet, writing of the two famous Barclays, William and John, concludes with these verses upon Robert:

"But lo! a third appears with serious air;
His Prince's darling, and his country's care.
See his religion, which so late before
Was like a jumbled mass of dross and ore,
Refined by him, and burnish'd o'er with art,
Awakes the spirit, and attracts the heart."

After a life marked with such activity and suffering for conscience' sake, this good man was permitted to spend the last few years of his life in peace. He died October 3, 1690, at his mansion at Ury, in Kincairdineshire, Scotland. The estate of Ury had been purchased by Colonel David Barclay in the year of Robert's birth, (1648.) The Colonel was obliged to part with two estates, which had been in his family, one, three hundred, and the other, five hundred years. About 1679 Robert obtained a charter, under the Great Seal, from King Charles the Second, erecting his lands of Ury into "a free Barony, with a civil and criminal jurisdiction to him and his heirs forever." This charter was ratified by Act of Parliament temp. James the Seventh of Scotland, and Second of England, "for the many faithful services done by Colonel David Barclay, and his son, the said Robert Barclay, to the King, and his most royal progenitors in times past." This barony, with all similar jurisdictions, was extinguished by the changes effected in the government of Scotland temp. George II. Robert Barclay left seven children, all of whom were alive in October, 1740, fifty years after their father's death. At the same time there were living between fifty and sixty grand-children and great grand-children.

"A good man leaveth an inheritance to his children's children," and a good name has these advantages over all other bequests;—it can be shared without division, enjoyed without diminution, and remains an imperishable capital, stimulating to and aiding like acquisitions.

Barclay, William, 1546-1605? an eminent civilian, father to John Barclay, author of the "Argenis," was born in Aberdeenshire, Scotland. He was in favour with Mary Queen of Scots: after her dethronement he went to France, applied himself to the study of belles-lettres, law, and philosophy, and graduated doctor in the civil and canon laws. The Duke of Lorraine appointed him professor of civil law in the University of Pont-à-Mousson, and a counsellor and master of requests to his hospital. He visited England at the request of James I., and was offered a professorship of civil law at one of the universities, and other honours, upon condition of his attaching himself to the Church of England. These offers he declined, returned to France in 1604, and accepted the professorship of civil law in the University of Angers. One of his principal works is De Regno et Regali Potestate adversus Buchananum Brutum, Boucherum et Reliquos Monarchomachos, Paris, 1600. Boucher had put forth a treatise in 1589, here referred to, entitled De Juste Henrici III. Boucher was a leaguer; Barclay, on the contrary, argues in favour of the supremacy of the king even over the laws, and the right of the monarch to the implicit obedience of his people, save in cases of outrageous oppression; which last flaw, of course, quashes the whole indictment against any case of resistance, as opinion must of necessity be the umpire. Although a zealous Roman Catholic, Barclay defended the sovereignty of the crown of France, even against the Pope. His work, De Potestate Papæ an et quatenus in Reges et Principes seculares Jus et Imperium habeat, was pub. Frank., 1609, London, in English in 1611. We have already given an account of this work in the biography of the author's son; also of the response of Cardinal Bellarmine, the circulation of which was forbidden by the Parliament of Paris. Barclay also pub. Prometia in Vitam Agricola, Paris, 1599. Comm. in Titl. Pandectarum de Rebus Creditis et de Jurejurando, Paris, 1605.

Our learned civilian, like some other philosophers, seems not to have been so fond of simplicity as some of the Grecian sages, for

"He went every day to school, attended by a servant, who went bare-headed before him, he himself having a rich robe lined with ermine, the train of which was supported by two servants, and his son upon his right hand; and there hung about his neck a great chain of gold, with a medal of gold, with his own picture."—Mackenzie's Lives.

The critique, from which the above is extracted, is very severe. Mr. Edwards finds fault with the Perspective portion of the works, but commends the instructions, so far as they relate to the process of paintings, as the best that had been published. See Edwards's Anecdotes of Painting.

Barham, Richard Harris, 1788-1845, Rector of St. Augustine's, and St. Faith, London, was better known by the literary name of Thomas Ingoldsby. His Ingoldsby Legends were contributed to Bentley's Miscellany, and since collected in volumes. Of the First Series, a 5th ed. was pub. in 1852; Second Series, 3d ed., 1842; Third Series, 2d ed., with Life of the Author, 1847. Mr. Barham, during many years, contributed to a number of periodicals, viz.: The Edinburgh Review, Blackwood's Magazine, The Literary Gazette, &c. His popular novel, My Cousin Nicholas, was pub. in three vols.

"Of his poetical pieces it is not too much to say, that for originality of design and diction, for quaint illustration and musical verse, they are not surpassed in the English language. The Witches Frolic is second only to Tam O'Shanter; and the Hon. Mr. Suckledumbkin's Story of the Execution is as satirical a reproof of a vile, morbid appetite, as ever was couched in laughable measure. But why recapitulate the titles of either prose or verse,—the lays of dark ages belonging to the fables of St. Cuthbert, St. Aloys, St. Dunstan, St. Nicholas, St. Odille, or St. Gengulphus,—since they have been confessed by every judgment to be singularly rich in classic allusion and modern illustration. From the days of Hudibras to our time, the drollery invested in rhymes has never been so amply or felicitously exemplified; and if derision has been unsparingly applied, it has been to lash knavery and imposture."

Barker, Edmund Henry, 1788-1839, entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1807. He was a contributor to the Classical Journal for twenty years.

"His first article appeared in No. 3, and nearly every succeeding number exhibited either his sign manual, or else an anonymous article that carried with it internal evidence of his being the author, from the numerous references to, and scarcely less numerous extracts from, writers but little known; and by a similar test it is easy to trace his contributions to the British Critic, previously to its change from a monthly to a quarterly periodical, and more recently in the pages of the Monthly Magazine during the editorship of Mr. Reynolds."—Lon. Gent. Mag.

On leaving the University, about 1810, Mr. Barker took up his residence with Dr. Parr, at Hatton, where he remained for five years. Soon after the death of his learned friend, he pub. Parriana, which is, with injustice, described in the Lon. Monthly Review as "a metrical effusion of ignorance, vanity, and absolute imbecility." Whilst turning over rare classical tomes, in a true Dominie Sampson spirit, in Dr. Parr's curious library, Mr. Barker conceived the idea of preparing a new edition of Stephens's Thesaurus Lingue Græcæ; "intending to introduce whatever materials the lapse of two centuries and a quarter could furnish for the improvement of the Greek Lexicography." The editor engaged in this undertaking with great zeal, accumulated a large stock of material, paid pounds each for volumes, which, at the sale of his library, scarcely brought shillings, and was encouraged by a list of 800 (Quarterly Review states 1100) subscribers. Vol. 1, Parts I-IV, appeared in 1815-1818; and the classical enthusiast was prepared to wear his blushing honours with no little delectation; when, in an evil hour for our Hellenist, Greek met Greek in a terrible charge in the Quarterly Review, (vol. xxii. p. 302,) and if Demosthenes did not fly from Chæroneæ, the friends of the discomfited warrior carried him away on their shields. Blomfield's "swashing blow" was not fully met by the "Aristarchus Anti-Blomfieldianus," which has been called "telum imbelles sine ictu."

Barker indeed was not silenced, as was Bentley by the famous "Remarks" of Conyers Middleton; but though the Thesaurus with its cargo appeared, the colours of the captain were not nailed to the mast. The name of the owner only was blazoned on the craft. The work, however, "at last made its way through the press, and consists of several ponderous folios, forming the most complete lexicographical collection that ever yet has appeared. This is, in fact, its principal merit; for in detail it is liable to much criticism."

THIS MAGNUM OPUS comprises no less than 11,752 pages of double columns! but, "nihil sine labore, et labor ipse voluptas" was so true of Barker, that "When a friend once condoled with him on the horrible bore of making the index, that had occupied three years in the composing and printing, Mr. B. observed that they were the happiest years of his life: for he had thus read again and again the Thesaurus, which he should not have otherwise done."—BUSONI.

Mr. Barker pub., in 1812, Classical and Biblical Recreations, one volume only of which ever appeared. He gave to the world editions of the Latin Esop, Cæsar, Cicero, Tacitus, Demosthenes, and Xenophon, with English Notes. He also edited a translation of Buttmann's Greek Grammar, and, in conjunction with Professor Dunbar, of Edinburgh, pub. a Greek-English and English-Greek Lexicon. He transmitted to Sturtz, Notes on the Etymologicon Gudianum, which work the latter was editing. These notes were considered by Barker evidences of his skill in Greek lexicography. He also pub. a volume to disprove the claims of Sir Philip Francis to the authorship of Junius's Letters. An English reprint of Professor Anthon's American edition of Lemprière's Classical Dictionary. A Letter to Rev. T. S. Hughes. A reprint of Barksdale, Clement, 1609-1687, entered as a servitor in Merton College, Oxford, in 1625. After pursuing his studies with great assiduity he took holy orders, and in 1637 supplied the place of chaplain of Lincoln College at the church of All Saints. At the Restoration, Charles II. gave him the living of Naunton near Hawling, in Gloucestershire, which he retained until his death.

"He was a good Disputant, a great admirer of Hugh Grotius, a frequent Preacher, but very conceited and vain, a great pretender Dover was constantly there in Person well mounted and accoutred, and was the chief Director and Manager of those Games frequented by the Nobility and Gentry, (some of whom came 60 Miles to see them,) even till the rascally Rebellion was begun by the Presbyterians, which gave a stop to their Proceedings, and spoiled all that was generous or ingenious elsewhere."—*Athen. Barlow, J. The Loss of the Abergavenny; a Poem, 1805.

Barlow, Joel, 1755-1812, was a native of Reading, Connecticut. He was first placed at Dartmouth College, but returned to New Haven, where he graduated in 1778. After a very insufficient preparation, he obtained a license to preach, and joined the American army in the capacity of chaplain. In 1783, when the army was disbanded, Barlow threw aside his clerical character, and resumed his law studies. He was not successful at the bar, and was induced to visit Europe in 1788 as an agent of the Scioto Company. At Paris he was a zealous adherent of the Girondists. Whilst yet at Paris, in 1795, he was appointed, by President Washington, consul to Algiers. Returning to the French capital, he resumed some mercantile operations in which he had previously been engaged. His enterprise was rewarded by a handsome fortune. After 17 years' absence he returned to America in 1805, and purchased a house in Washington, where he took up his residence. In 1811 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to the French government. His negotiations at Paris for a commercial treaty, and indemnification for spoliation, were not successful. In the autumn of 1812 he received an invitation to a conference with Napoleon at Wilna, in Poland. Whilst on his journey, his progress was arrested by an attack of inflammation of the lungs, of which he died at Zarnowitch, a small village near Craoow. Barlow's first literary production, a poem written in 1778, may be found in a volume entitled American Poems, pub. at Litchfield in 1793. In 1791, when made Master of Arts, he recited a poem called The Prospect of Peace, which was subsequently merged in The Columbiad. The germ of this epic, The Vision of Columbus, was pub. in 1787. His next literary employment was editing Watts's Version of the Psalms, pub. in 1786. He was concerned about this time in a weekly paper, a book store, and in contributing to the Anarchiad. In 1791 he pub. in London the first part of his Advice to the Privileged Orders. Part II. appeared in 1795. In 1792 he gave to the public The Conspiracy of Kings, a poem of about 400 lines. Whilst at Chambéry, in Savoy, he wrote The Hasty Pudding, the most popular of his poems.

"This is a very pleasing performance. . . . His versification is successfully modelled upon that of Goldsmith: he has interspersed the poem with several ludicrous parodies on the most popular passages of English poetry, and his subject naturally presented him with many images and views of life, which, if not in themselves highly poetical, have, at least, all the fresh bloom and fragrance of untrod novelty."—Analectic Magazine.

We should not omit to mention Barlow's zealous attempts to establish a great national academy under the patronage of the federal government. In 1806 he drew up a prospectus of a national institution. Mr. Logan, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill into the Senate of the United States, and it passed to a second reading. It was referred to a committee who never reported, and the project came to nothing.

In 1808 The Columbiad made its appearance in the most magnificent volume which had ever been pub. in America. The engravings were executed in London. A few copies were sold, but the high price was an obstacle to circulation. A cheaper edition was issued in 1809; and in the same year it was pub. in London by Phillips. The Columbiad is composed of a number of visions, in which Heeper, the genius of the western Continent, presents to Columbus, whilst immured in prison at Valladolid, "that which shall be hereafter." The War of the Revolution, the events which are to precede, and those which are to follow, form part of the vast matériel of this epic.

"This poem has a radical defect of plan, which it would have been difficult for any degree of poetical genius to have completely overcome. It is the narrative of a vision and a dialogue, continued through ten cantos, and nearly 7000 lines. Its time of action extends from a remote period of antiquity to distant futurity, and the scene shifts, with the rapidity of a pantomime, from one part of the globe to another. It has no regularly connected narration, or series of action, by which characters might be developed, interest excited, and the attention kept alive. Besides, the constant mixture of real and familiar history with allegory and fiction, is a combination utterly destructive of that temporary illusion by which we are led to interest ourselves in the adventures of an epic hero. . . . His verses bear no signs of poetical inspiration: it is evident that they have all been worked by dint of resolute labour."—Analectic Mag., vol. iv.

The faults, both of plan and execution, of the Columbiad, "were remarked upon, with their usual severity, by the Edinburgh reviewers, as well as several other critical journals of this country and of Great Britain." Barlow bore these attacks without making any formal defence, yet with less dignity than became a philosopher, attributing them all to political enmity, and, like Sir Fretful Plagiary in the play, often expressing his utter contempt and disregard of all his assailants.

"In sketching the history of America from the days of Manco Capac down to the present day, and a few thousand years lower, the author, of course, cannot spare time to make us acquainted with any one individual. The most important personages, therefore, appear but once upon the scene, and then pass away and are forgotten. Mr. Barlow's exhibition accordingly partakes more of the nature of a procession, than of a drama. River gods, machems, majors of militia, all enter at one side of his stage, and go off at the other, never to return. Rocha and Oella take up as much room as Greene and Washington; and the rivers Potowmack and Delaware, those fluent and venerable personages, both act and talk a great deal more than Jefferson or Franklin."—LORD JEFFREY: Edinburgh Review. See OLINSTEAD, REV. LEMUEL G.

Barlow, John, became a student of Hart Hall, Oxf., in 1600. He pub. a number of sermons, (vide Athen. Oxon.) 1618-32.

Barlow, Thomas, 1607-1691, descended from the ancient family of Barlow-moore in Lancashire, was born at Langhill, in Westmoreland. In his 16th year he was entered of Queen's College, Oxford, and in 1633 was chosen Fellow of his College. Two years later he received the appointment of metaphysic-reader in the University. His lectures were highly commended, and were pub. in 1637-38. In 1652 he was elected keeper of the Bodleian Library, and in 1657 was chosen provost of his college, succeeding Dr. Langbaine. On the death of Bishop Fuller he was consecrated his successor in the see of Lincoln. He was a voluminous writer. Among his principal works are the following: A Letter on Redemption, 1651. For Toleration of the Jews, 1660. Mr. Cottington's Case of Divorce, 1671. Confutation of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome, 1673. The Gunpowder Treason, 1679. Against Popery, 1679. Quincii Cornelii Europæi Monarchia Solipossorum, 1680. Several Treatises relative to Dissenters, and the Church of Rome, 1676-88. He left directions that none of his MSS. should be printed after his death; nevertheless Sir Peter Pett pub. his Cases of Conscience in 1692, and Genuine Remains of Bishop Barlow in 1693. On the latter work Henry Brougham pub. Reflections in 1694: the list of books was pub. separately by W. Olney in 1699.

"This, as likewise Bp. Wilkins's Ecclesiastes, (9th ed. pub. 1718,) contains much valuable information respecting older books of divinity."—LOWNDEN.

Two Letters of Bp. Barlow's on Justification were repub. in 1826.

"In these excellent letters the Bishop ably establishes the doctrines of the Reformation."

"If the Reader wishes to see this subject treated with a degree of closeness of reasoning and logical accuracy which defies confutation, he will do well to peruse these Letters."—ANDRÆAOS BROWNE.

Wood quotes a florid commendation of our author by Arthur, Earl of Anglesey.

"I never think of this Bishop, and of his incomparable knowledge both in Theology and Church History, and in the Ecclesiastical Law, without applying to him in my Thoughts, the Character that Cicero gave Crassus, viz.: Non unus e multis, sed unus inter omnes, prope singularis."—MÉMOIRS.

Barlow, or Barlowe, William, d. 1568, was before the Reformation a monk in the Augustine Monastery of St. Osith in Essex, and was educated there, and at Oxford. It is a very remarkable fact that he was successively bishop of four sees, viz.: 1. St. Asaph; 2. St. David's; 3. Bath and Wells; 4. Chichester; and was father-in-law to four bishops, and one archbishop, viz.: the bishops of, 1. Hereford, 2. Winchester, (Day.) 3. Lichfield and Coventry. 4. Winchester, (Wickham.) 5. Archbishop of York. (The five daughters were all by one wife, Agatha Wellesbourne.) So that our author was not without "benefit of Clergy." He wrote Christian Homilies, Cosmography, (?) The Buriall of the Mass, Lutheran Factions, (?) Lon., 1553, 2d ed. He assisted in the compilation of The Godly and Pious Institution of a Christian Man, commonly called The Bishop's Book, Lon., 1537. He is said to have trans. into English, in Edward VI.'s reign, The Apocrypha as far as the Book of Wisdom. There is in Bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, His Answers to certain Queries concerning the Abuses of the Mass.

"In 1553, upon Queen Mary's coming to the Crown, he was deprived of his Bishoprick (Bath and Wells) for being married; committed for some time to the Fleet, whence escaping, he retired with many others into Germany under pretence of Religion, and lived there in a poor and exile condition."—A. WOOD.

He was noted for his propensity to levity and jesting. Archbishop Cranmer would sometimes say at the conclusion of a long debate,

"This is all very true: but my brother Barlowe, in half an hour, will teach the world to believe it is but a jest." See Strype's Cranmer, Parker, Annals, Blog. Brit., Harrington's Brief View.

Barlow, William, d. 1613, successively Bishop of Rochester and Lincoln, was a native of Lancashire. He was a Fellow of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and Chaplain to Queen Elizabeth and to Archbishop Whitgift. In 1605 he was elected Bishop of Rochester, and in 1608 was translated to Lincoln. His principal works are Defence of the Articles of the Protestant Religion against a Certain Libel, Lon., 1601; Authentic Relation of the Famous Conference between Archbishop Whitgift and the Puritans, held at Hampton Court, Jan. 14, 15, 16, 1603, before King James I., Lon., 1604. He trans. three Sermons from Lavater, Lon., 1596, and pub. a Life of Dr. Richard Cosin, an eminent civilian, with whom he had lived in his youth. See Haasted's Kent, vol. ii., and Willis's Cathedrals. He was reputed a learned and excellent preacher.

Barlow, or Barlowe, William, d. 1625, a divine and an eminent mathematician, was the son of William Barlow, Bishop of St. David's, &c.—(See ante.) He entered a commoner at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1560; B. A., 1564; about which time he went to sea, where he acquired a considerable knowledge of navigation, which he put to profitable use in his writings. About 1573 he took holy orders, and in 1588 became prebendary of Lichfield. He deserves commendation as a practical philosopher, and acute observer in the department which engaged his attention. He wrote several works on his favourite subjects.

"This book was written by a bishop's sonne, And by affinity to many bishops kinne."

We have seen [BARLOW Bp. WILLIAM, ante] that he had five episcopal brothers-in-law.

"Considering the period at which it was written, this is certainly a most extraordinary production."

Magnetical Advertisement, concerning the Nature and Properties of the Loadstone, Lon., 1616; A Brief Discovery of the Idle Animadversions of Mark Ridley, M.D., upon a Treatise entitled Magnetical Advertisement, Lon., 1618.

"This was the person who had knowledge in the Magnet 20 years before Dr. Will Gilbert published his Book of that subject, and therefore by those that knew him, he was accounted superior, or at least equal to that Doctor for an industrious and happy searcher and finder out of many rare and magnetical secrets. He was the first that made the inclinatory instrument transparent, and to be used pendant, with a glass on both sides and ring on the top, whereas Dr. Gilbert's hath it but of one side, and to be set on a foot. And moreover, he hang'd it in a Compass-box, where with two ounces weight, it was fit for use at sea. Secondly, he was the first that found out and shewed the difference between Iron and Steel, and their tempers for Magnetical Uses, which hath given life and quickening, universally to all Magnetical Instruments whatsoever. Thirdly, he was the first that showed the right way of touching Magnetical Needles. Fourthly, he was the first that found out and showed the piercing and cementing of Loadstones. And lastly, the first that showed the reasons why a Loadstone being double capped, must take up so great weight."—Athen. Oxon.; also see Hutton's Mathematical Dictionary.

As the first English writer on the nature and properties of the magnet, and the inventor of the compass-box, as now used at sea, Barlow's name should ever be held in high esteem, not only by those "who go down to the sea in ships and occupy their business in the great waters," but by all who are in any way interested—and who can be excepted?—in the profitable uses of navigation.

Barnard, Lady Anne, 1750-1825, was the daughter of James Lindsay, fifth Earl of Balcarra, and wife to Sir Andrew Barnard, librarian to George III. She was authoress of the well-known ballad, Auld Robin Gray; the authorship of which was kept a secret for more than fifty years. In 1823, in a letter to Sir Walter Scott, Lady Barnard acknowledges the ballad as her own, and gives an interesting account of the circumstances attending its production. Captain Hall tells us that during a visit to Abbotsford in 1825,

"Sir Walter entertained us much by an account of the origin of the beautiful song of 'Auld Robin Gray.' 'It was written,' he said, 'by Lady Anne Lindsay, now Lady Anne Barnard. She happened to be at a house where she met Miss Suff Johnson, a well-known person, who played the air, and accompanied it by words of no great delicacy, whatever their antiquity might be; and Lady Anne, lamenting that no better words should belong to such a melody, immediately set to work, and composed this very pathetic story. Truth, I am sorry to say, obliges me to add that it was a fiction. Robin Gray was her father's gardener, and the idea of the young lover going to sea, which would have been quite out of character here amongst the shepherds, was natural enough where she was then residing, on the coast of Fife. It was long unknown who the author was; and indeed there was a clergyman on the coast whose conscience was so large that he took the burden of this matter upon himself, and pleaded guilty to the authorship. About two years ago I wrote to Lady Anne to know the truth, and she wrote back to say she was certainly the author, but wondered how I could have guessed it, as there was no person alive to whom she had told it. When I mentioned having heard it long ago from a common friend who was dead, she then recollected me, and wrote me one of the kindest letters I ever received, saying she had till now not the smallest idea that I was the little lame boy she had known so many years before."

In 1825, Sir Walter Scott edited for the Bannatyne Club a tract containing a corrected version of the original ballad, and two continuations by the authoress.

Barnardiston, J., Master of Corpus Christi College. Sermon, preached before the House of Commons, Matt. xxii. 21, 1766.

Barnardiston, Thomas. Reports of Cases in the High Court of Chancery, 13 and 14 Geo. II., from April 25, 1740, to May 9, 1741; folio, Lon., 1742. Respecting the merits of these reports there has been a wide difference of opinion. Lord Mansfield, who knew the reporter, and was at the bar when the reports were taken, considered them as lacking authority, and went so far as to forbid counsel to refer to them in arguing cases before him. We find the following anecdote in Marvin's Legal Bibl.

"Mr. Preston, in an argument before the Lord Chancellor, remarked,— 'We come now, my lord, to the important case of Elliot v. Merryman, on which conveyancers have at all times relied as very material to the law affecting the case now before the court, which is in Barnardiston's Reports.' Lord Lyndhurst: 'Barnardiston, Mr. Preston! I fear that is a book of no great authority; I recollect, in my younger days, it was said of Barnardiston, that he was accustomed to slumber over his note-book, and the wags in his rear took the opportunity of scribbling nonsense into it.' Mr. Preston: '*There are some cases in Barnardiston, which in my experience, and having had frequent occasion to compare that reporter's cases with the same cases elsewhere, I have found to be the only sensible and intelligible reports, and I trust I shall show your lordship that it may be said of Barnardiston, non omnis dormio.*' Lord Mansfield, relying on a case in these reports, says: '*Although Barnardiston is not considered a very correct reporter, yet some of his cases are very accurately reported.*' And Lord Eldon, in reference to the same work, observed, 'I take the liberty of saying, that in that book there are reports of very great authority.' The doubts as to the accuracy of the reporter, have led, in several instances, to a comparison of the volumes with the register's book, which proves that Barnardiston, for the most part, has correctly reported the decisions of the Court. These reports have a peculiar value, from the fact of containing the decisions of the great Lord Hardwicke; and if the author has occasionally fallen into slight errors, they are neither so glaring, or numerous, as to detract much from their merits, or render them unworthy of a place in every lawyer's library."

Reports of Cases in the Court of King's Bench, &c., from 1726-31. 2 vols. folio, Lon., 1744. Frequently condemned, and yet often cited. The accuracy of some of the reports is proved by a comparison with other reporters.

"Not of much authority in general."—Lord KENTON. See Walpole's Reports; Marvin's Legal Bibl.

Barnes, Major——. Tour through St. Helena, 1817.

Barnes, Albert, b. 1798, is a native of Rome, New York. In 1817 he entered Fairfield Academy, Connecticut, where he remained nearly three years. In 1819 he entered the senior class of Hamilton College, and graduated in July, 1820. He had intended devoting himself to the practice of the law, but was led by convictions of duty to prepare for the ministry. He pursued his theological studies at the Princeton Seminary. He was licensed April 23, 1823, at Lawrenceville, New Jersey, by the Presbytery of Elizabethtown. After preaching at various places in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New Jersey, he took charge of the First Presbyterian Church in Morristown, New Jersey. In 1839 he received a call from the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, and was installed June 25, 1839, and still continues pastor of that congregation, (1858.)

The particulars of the ecclesiastical experience of this eminently useful and highly esteemed gentleman it does not come within our province to notice.

In this country and in Great Britain, Mr. Barnes (for he has repeatedly refused the title of D.D. from conscientious motives) is widely known for his commentaries on the books of the New Testament, (pub. at intervals, in eleven volumes,) on Job, Isaiah, and Daniel. The notes upon the New Testament have been very extensively circulated among Sunday-school teachers, and others, and form one of the most useful instrumentalities in the Scriptural education of the young. With the doctrinal views of the author we have here nothing to do: it is however but justice to others to remark that many of the eminent gentlemen whose favourable opinions of Mr. Barnes we shall quote below, do not coincide with his views in several important points.

"Mr. Barnes's style is plain, simple, and direct; and though his pages teem with the material of deep scholarship, yet he is, for the most part, eminently happy in making himself intelligible and interesting to every class; while the rich practical remarks, every now and then grafted upon the critical details, transmute the devotional spirit of the writer into the bosom of his reader."—Amer. Biblical Repository.

"We here have a work [Notes on the Epistle to the Romans] better calculated, probably, than any other single volume that could be named, to furnish a correct and competent acquaintance with that important part of Scripture of which it treats,—and one that may be safely recommended to all classes, not only on this particular ground, but also on its general merits as a manual of Christian doctrines and of Christian ethics—of experimental and practical godliness. We should like to see it in the hands of all our young people."—Congregational Magazine.

Of the same work the Rev. James Hamilton remarks:

"Judging from that specimen I cannot but rejoice in the popularity and extensive circulation of the work. [The Notes on the New Testament.] The notes are simple, direct, and satisfactory; the production of a mind clear, fresh, and furnished with abundant learning, which is not ostentatious of itself."

The late very distinguished divine, Rev. J. Pye Smith, D.D., remarks:

"Of Barnes's Notes on the New Testament, I purchased, as they arrived, the volumes of the New York edition."

"The Notes of Albert Barnes, practical and explanatory, on the New Testament, possess great excellence. They give within a short compass the results of extensive reading and of much thought; and they generally bring out the sense of the text with clearness and force."—Rev. William Lindsay, D.D., Prof. Bib. Criticism, U. P. Synod.

"Barnes has many excellencies as a commentator. His industry is great, and he has made a free but not unfair use of all available sources of information. Possessed naturally of a clear and vigorous understanding, his opinions are uniformly expressed in a brief, perspicuous manner. He has a singular facility in drawing practical conclusions from the doctrinal statements and historical incidents of the Scripture. They are distinguished by good sense and piety; they are natural without being obvious; and often so striking and pointed as to partake of the character of originality."—Rev. N. McMichael, Prof. of Eccles. Hist. U. P. Synod.

"I have perused a considerable portion of Barnes's Notes on the New Testament, to ascertain their suitability for the use of Sabbath-school teachers, and for the instruction of the young in families. These notes are neither very learned nor very profound; but they are characterized by good sense, earnest piety, and the natural graces of a style remarkable for its simplicity and ease."—Rev. W. M. Hetherington, LL.D., Pres. St. Paul's, Edinburgh.

"Barnes is so well known in this country as a commentator who combines some of the most important qualifications for the work he has undertaken, that he needs no further recommendation. I know no guide to the understanding of the sacred oracles more trustworthy. With respectable biblical scholarship, there is connected so much of evangelical sentiment, and genuine spirituality of mind, that I earnestly wish the work were in the hands of all persons who are engaged as missionaries or teachers of the young."—Rev. William Brock, Bloomsbury, London.

"I consider Barnes's Notes on the New Testament to be one of the most valuable boons bestowed in these latter days on the Church of Christ. The perspicuous and forcible manner in which he presents the sense of Scripture, and the decidedly practical bearing with which he universally invests his expositions, cannot fail to recommend the work to all persons of enlightened and vigorous piety."—Rev. E. Henderson, D.D., London.

"Barnes's Notes on the New Testament are entitled to recommendation for their general simplicity and practical usefulness. They are of such a description that they may be read with interest and profit by all."—Rev. Alex. Hill, D.D., Prof. of Divinity in the University of Glasgow.

"There are some peculiar excellencies in Barnes, and these are such, and so important, as to give his book special claims on our attention and gratitude. The clearness and simplicity of his exposition, his devotional spirit, and his practical remarks, greatly enhance his commentary."—Rev. James Morgan, D.D., Belfast.

"His style is generally plain and perspicuous, but where occasion offers, energetic and effective."—Rev. H. Coke, D.D., LL.D., Belfast.

"The primary design of Barnes's Commentary on the New Testament, is to furnish Sunday-school teachers with a plain and simple explanation of the more common difficulties of the book which it is their province to teach. For this purpose it is admirably adapted; and if it be carefully perused by the interesting class of benefactors for whose advantage it is immediately intended, it cannot fail, under the divine blessing, greatly to advance their efficiency and usefulness."—Rev. David King, LL.D., United Presb. Church, Glasgow.

The above opinions, which are all connected with commendations of Blackie & Son's (Glasgow, Edin., and Lon.) edition, with supplementary notes, are the more to be prized, as each one of the divines cited objects to some of Mr. Barnes's doctrinal views. The supplementary notes are intended, and by these gentlemen accepted, as correctives to this real or supposed want of soundness in the faith. We subjoin an expression of opinion from a very distinguished authority:

"Barnes is an admirable commentator. The ease and vigour of his style; the clear and natural manner in which he elicits the sense of the text; the point, variety, and impressiveness of his practical reflections, and the evangelical spirit which pervades the whole, combine to render him deservedly popular."—Rev. John Harris, D.D., Author of Mammon, &c.

"Mr. Barnes has attained to just celebrity both in America and England, as a sound and judicious expositor of Holy Scripture. His comments on Isaiah, on the Gospels, on the Acts of the Apostles, and on the Epistle to the Romans, have all enhanced his credit as 'a scribe well instructed in the mysteries of the kingdom.' As an interpreter of the word of God, he is remarkably free from vague hypotheses and hazardous speculation."—Lon. Ec. M.

Barnes, Barnaby, b. about 1569, was younger son to Dr. Barnes, Bishop of Durham. He became a student of Brasenose College in 1586, and left without a degree. In 1591, according to Dr. Bliss, (Athen. Oxon., edit. 1815,) he accompanied the Earl of Essex into France. He relieved his military duties by writing sonnets, &c.

Parthenophil and Parthenope. Sonnettes, Madrigals, Elegies, and Odes. The Printer's Address is dated May, 1593; see an account of this volume in Beloe's Anecdotes, vol. ii. pp. 77-79. Many of the Sonnettes are inscribed to Henry, Earl of Southampton; the most virtuous, learned, and bewtiful Ladie Marie, Countesse of Pembroke; to the right virtuous and most bewtiful, the Lady Strangue. The Lady Brigett Manners, &c. Neither Wood nor Watt seem to have known any thing of this book. A copy in the Bib. Anglo-Poet. is priced £30. The opening sonnet is in a very pious strain:

"Thy wounds, my Cure, deare Saviour! I desire
To peace my thoughts! thy Serle Cherubim,
(By kindling my desires,) true zeale t' infuse,
Thy lone my theame, and Holy Ghost my muse."

The Sonnettes are 100 in number, and are succeeded by a Hymne to the glorious honovr of the most blessed and indivisible Trinitie. A Divine Centvrie of Spiritual Sonnets, Lon., 1595; reprinted in the second vol. of the Heliconia. Dedicated to Dr. Tobie Mathew.

Devil's Charter, a Tragedy; containing the Life and Death of Pope Alexander the Sixth, Lon., 1607, 4to. Barnes in 1598 wrote a Sonnet, prefixed to Florio's World of Words; in 1606 he presented another, printed as a preface to Fame's Memorial to Ford, and in the same year translated Cicero's Offices. See Ellis's Specimens for several of Barnes's Sonnets, which "at least have the merit of combining an arbitrary recurrence of rhyme with the dignified freedom of blank verse." We have an amusing specimen of humility in his dedication of his Offices to King James: he presents his work "under a special pardon for his boldness in daring to do it as a poore unlearned scholar, which offereth his ignorance in some rude exercise unto his learned schoole-master."

"So little however is his work to be regarded as proceeding from the head or hand of an unlearned scholar, that it consists chiefly of citations from the writings of the ancient historians, philosophers, and poets, who penned their productions in the Greek and Latin languages."—Restituta: See ante.

Barnes, Daniel H., d. 1818, a Baptist preacher, and an eminent conchologist of New York, originated and conducted, in conjunction with Dr. Griscom, the high school of New York; he was also an active member of the Lyceum of natural history in that city. He presided over several seminaries, and refused the presidency of the college at Washington City. He contributed several valuable papers, illustrated by explanatory plates on Conchology, to Silliman's Journal, viz., Geological Section of the Canaan Mountain, v. 8-21; Memoir on the genera unio and alasmodontia, with numerous figures, vi. 107-127, 258-280; Five species of chiton, with figures, vii. 69-72; Memoir on batrachian animals, and doubtful reptiles, xi. 269-297, xiii. 66-70. "The cases in this volume are very briefly reported, and are not always to be relied on. Indeed, it could hardly be expected, in a volume containing more than 2500 cases, upon points of practice decided by various judges, whose opinions were not always coincident, that there would be uniformity and agreement throughout."—Martin's Legal Bibl.

We extract some opinions from Wallace's Reporters, which, with the volume cited above, should be in the library of every lawyer and man of general reading. Both of these excellent manuals have become very scarce, and should be reprinted.

"Barnes has in general reported the practice of the court with accuracy."—SIR FRANCIS BULLER.

"Many cases reported in Barnes are not law."—MR. JUSTICE KEATHE.

"When a 'rule absolute' was claimed from Chief Justice Abbot, and Barnes was instanced as authority, the chief justice replied, 'You may find rules absolute in Barnes for any thing.'"

"Barnes is an authority of little weight. . . . His cases are so contradictory that they destroy each other."—WILLIAMS, of the N. York Bar.

"The cases cited from Barnes are good as historical evidence to prove the point of practice in issue."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

"Barnes is good authority, I believe, for points of practice, though for little beside."—CHIEF JUSTICE GIBSON of Penn.

Barnes, John, an English Roman Catholic, of a Lancashire family, studied for some time at Oxford,

"But being always in animo Catholicus, he left it, and his country, and going into Spain, was instructed in Philosophy and Divinity by the famous Doctor J. Alp. Curiel, who was wont to call Barnes by the name of John Huss, because of a spirit of contradiction which was always observed in him."—WOOD.

In 1625, at which period he was one of the confessors of the Abbey of Chelles, he pub. a work against mental reservation, entitled Dissertatio contra equivocationes, Paris; a French trans. was pub. at the same time. Theophilus Raynaud attempted to answer this book in 1627. In the same year, Barnes wrote Catholicus-Romanus Pacificus: an edition was pub. at Oxford in 1680; part of it had been before made use of by Dr. Basire in his Ancient Liberty of the Britannie Church. He also wrote an answer to Clement Reyner's Apostolatus Benedictinorum in Anglia. Wood tells us that "This learned person being a very moderate man in his opinion, and deeply sensible by his great reading and observation of several corruptions of the Romish Church and Doctrine, which partly were expressed in his Discourse, but mostly in a book which he wrote, called Catholicus-Romanus Pacificus," &c. Barnes was seized in Paris, "was carried out from the midst of that city by force, was divested of his habit, and like a four-footed brute, was in a barbarous manner tied to a horse, and violently hurried away into Flanders." He escaped from prison at Mechlin, but was retaken and thrown into a prison of the Inquisition, where he died after thirty years' confinement. Wood repels with scorn the story of Barnes's insanity whilst in prison:

"Certain fierce people at Rome, being not contented with his Death, have endeavoured to extinguish his Fame, boldly publishing that he died distracted."

Barnes, Joshua, 1654-1712, a learned divine, and professor of Greek at Cambridge, was a native of London. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, where his early proficiency in Greek was the subject of remark. In 1671 he was admitted a servitor in Emanuel College, Cambridge, was elected fellow in 1678, and in 1686 took the degree of B.D. In 1695 he was chosen Greek professor of the University of Cambridge. In his 15th year he pub. a collection of English poems, and was interested at an early age in several other works. He gave to the world in 1675, Geramia, or a New Discovery of a little sort of People, called Pigmies. In the next year appeared his poetical paraphrase of the History of Esther, which had been for a long time in preparation. Select Discourses appeared in 1680. In 1688 was pub. The History of that most victorious monarch, Edward III. The author has imitated Thucydides in putting long speeches into the mouths of his characters. Nicolson remarks:

"Above all, Mr. Joshua Barnes has diligently collected whatever was to be had, far and near, upon the several passages of this great King's reign. His quotations are many; and generally, his authors are as well chosen as such a multitude can be supposed to have been. His inferences are not always becoming a statesman; and sometimes his digressions are tedious. His deriving of the famous institution of the Garter from the Phenicians, is extremely obliging to good Mr. Sammes; but came too late, it seems, to Mr. Ashmole's knowledge, or otherwise would have bid fair for a choice post of honour in his elaborate book. In short, this industrious author seems to have driven his work too fast to the press, before he had provided an index, and some other accoutrements, which might have rendered it more servicable to his readers."—English Historical Library.

The want of an index! How often have we groaned over indexless books! How often have we been obliged to do for ourselves what the wittiest author would not do for us—and make an index to his book! His edition of Euripides, dedicated to Charles, Duke of Somerset, was pub. in 1694. In 1705 appeared his Anacreon, dedicated to the Duke of Marlborough; and in 1701 he pub. an edition of Homer: the Iliad dedicated to the Earl of Pembroke, and the Odyssey to the Earl of Nottingham. He wrote many other treatises, a list of which, including those which he had published, and those which he contemplated giving to the world, will be found prefixed to the edition of his Anacreon, pub. in 1705. We here find enumerated no less than 43 works! His facility in writing and speaking Greek was remarkable. He tells us in the parody of Homer, prefixed to his poem on Esther, that he could compose sixty Greek verses in an hour. He also avows in the preface to Esther that he found it much easier to write his annotations in Greek than in Latin, or even in English, "since the ornaments of poetry are almost peculiar to the Greeks, and since he had for many years been extremely conversant in Homer, the great father and source of the Greek poetry." He could off-hand turn a paragraph in a newspaper, or a hawk's bill, into any kind of Greek metre, and has been often known to do so among his Cambridge friends. Dr. Bentley used to say of Barnes that he "understood as much Greek as a Greek cobbler;" meaning doubtless by this that he had rather the "colloquial readiness of a vulgar mechanic," than the erudition, taste, and judgment of a scholar. The inscription suggested for his monument—first used by Menage in his satire upon Pierre Montmaur—we think too profane for repetition. The Greek Anacreontiques written for his monument have been thus translated

"Kind Barnes, adorn'd by every Muse,
Each Greek in his own art out-does:
No Orator was ever greater;
No poet ever chanted sweeter.

He excelled in Grammar Mystery,
And the Black Prince of History:
And a Divine the most profound
That ever trod on English ground."

See the Biog. Brit., where find, also, this note:

"Mr. Barnes read a small English Bible, that he usually carried about with him, one hundred and twenty-one times over, at leisure hours."

All this is upon his monument.

A Funeral Sermon on the Death of the Rev. Thomas Threlked of Rochdale, April 13, 1806.

This Mr. Threlked possessed a most remarkable memory:

"He was a perfect Living Concordance to the Scriptures. You could not mention three words, except perhaps those words of verre connection which occur in hundreds of passages, to which he could not immediately, without hesitation, assign the Chapter and Verse where they were to be found. And inversely, upon mentioning the Chapter and Verse, he could repeat the Words. It was, as might be expected, a favourite amusement of his fellow students to try his powers, and they were never known to fail him in a single instance. This Faculty continued with him unimpaired, to the day of his death. For, astonishing as the assertion may appear, it is believed by all his friends to be literally true, that he never through his whole life forgot one single number, or date combined with any name or fact, when they had been once joined together, and laid up in his memory. When once there, they were engraved as upon marble."

Thomas Barnes has been well called

"A man of uncommon activity and diligence with his pen, and is said to have written many hundred sermons which he never preached: a fact very extraordinary if we consider the number he must have been obliged to preach in the course of forty-two years."

Barnfield, Barnfield, or Barnesfelde, Richard, b. 1574, was entered at Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1589. He wrote The Affectionate Shepherd, pub. 1594, 12mo; Cynthia, 1595, 12mo. The author bespeaks the patience of the reader for his rude conceit of Cynthia:

"If for no other cause, yet for that it is the first imitation of the verse of that excellent poet, Malster Spencer, in his Fairlie Queene."

In 1589 he pub. The Encomium of Lady Pecunia, or the Praise of Money. The Complaint of Poetrie for the Death of Liberalitie. The Combat between Conscience and Covetousnesse in the Minde of Men; and poems in divers humours. A second edit. of this work, considerably altered, appeared in 1605. Greene's Funerals was erroneously attributed to Barnfield, but the ode, As it fell upon a Day—which was printed in England's Helicon, 1600, signed Ignoto, and had the year before been given as Shakespeare's, in the Passionate Pilgrim,—really belongs to our author. Come live with me, and be my love, is another well-known poem of our author's. See Rose's Biog. Dict.; Ellis's Specimens; Ritson's Bib. Poet.; Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry. It is interesting to us to read the opinions of any of Shakespeare's contemporaries upon the great bard; therefore we shall quote a few lines of Barnfield's, written in 1598, eighteen years before Shakespeare's death:

"And Shakespeare, thou, whose honey-flowing vein, (Pleasing the world) thy praises doth contain;
Whose Venus and whose Lucrece, sweet and chaste,
Thy name in fame's immortal book hath plac'd,
Live ever you, at least in fame live ever!
Well may the body die, but fame die never."

In 1816 James Boswell presented to the Members of the Roxburghe Club a reprint (34 copies, 4to) of Poems by Richard Barnfield, including Remarks by the late Edmund Malone. One of these copies was disposed of at Bindley's sale for £6 16s. 6d. Boswell's sale, £4 6s.

Baro, or Baron, Peter, d. about 1600, was born at Etampes, in France, but resided the principal part of his life in England, where he pub. a number of works. For this reason we have given him a place in our volume. He left his native country to avoid persecution, being a Protestant, and was received into the family of Lord Treasurer Burleigh. Upon the invitation of Dr. Pierce he settled at Cambridge, and there entered himself a student of Trinity College. In 1575 he was appointed successor to Dr. John Still as Margaret professor of divinity. His doctrine did not give satisfaction to some of his hearers, and he was involved in a number of controversies. Some went so far as to think that he was acting a traitor's part at Cambridge; designing to seduce those under his influence to the Roman Catholic Church.

"For so it was, and they could not be beaten out of it, that they thought, that as a certain Spaniard named Ant. Corranus was brought to, and settled in Oxon., purposely to corrupt the true doctrine; so Peter Baro, a French man was for Cambridge."—Wood.

Baro retained his chair until 1595, when he resigned, or as Wood says, was removed, "not without the consent of Dr. Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury." He removed to London, where he died about 1600. 1. In Jonam Prophetam Prælectiones XXXIX. 2. Conciones tres ad Clerum Cantabrigiensem, &c. 3. Theatres Publicas in scholis perorantæ et disputatæ. 4. Præcationes quibus Unus est Author in suis Prælectionibus inchoandis et finiendis. The three first-named were trans. into English by John Ludham. The whole were pub. in one vol., Lon., 1579, folio, by the care of Osmond Lake. Baro wrote several other works, which were pub. in 1580, 1613, et sine anno.

Baro, Baron, or Bonaventura, b. about 1600, d. 1696, was a Fitz-Gerald of Burnchurch in the county of Kilkenny. He was born at Clonmell in Ireland, and was a nephew of the celebrated Luke Wadding, a Franciscan friar, eminent for his theological works. Baro entered the Order of St. Francis, and resided almost entirely at Rome.

He was attached to the college of St. Isidore, a society of the Order of St. Francis, founded by Wadding, for the education of Irish students in the liberal arts, divinity, and controversy, to serve as a seminary out of which the mission into England, Scotland, and Ireland might be supplied. Baron was celebrated for the purity of his Latin style. His Opuscula varia were pub. in 1666. This contains his Metra Miscellanea, pub. 1645; Orations, 1645; Prolusiones Philosophicæ, 1651; Scotus Defensus, 1662; and all his separate works pub. ante 1666. Theologia was pub. at Paris in 1676, in 6 vols. Vol. 1st of The Annales Ordinis SS. Trinitatis Redemptionis Captivorum, which begins with the year 1198 and is carried down to 1297, was pub. at Rome in 1686.

A Cordial for Low Spirits. 2. The Pillars of Priestcraft and Orthodoxy shaken; enlarged to 4 vols., Lon., 1768. 3. Impression revised and improved with many additional Articles, Lon., 1763, 12mo, in 3 vols. Baron edited a number of works reprinted by Thomas Hollis, among which were the Iconoclastes of Milton, and a complete edition of the works of this great poet.

Baron, Robert, b. about 1630, was a student at Cambridge. He pub. in 1647 The Cyprian Academy, Poculia Castalia, &c., Lon., 1650. He was also the author of Mirra, a Tragedy; Gripus at Hægio; and Deorum Dona. See Winstanley, Philips, and Biog. Dramat., for other pieces ascribed to Baron: some of which are evidently not his.

"The author seems [in Mirra] to have propos'd for his pattern the famous Castille, writ by Ben. Jonson, and has in several places not only hit the model of his Scenes: but even imitated the Language tolerably, for a young writer." See Langbaine's Dramatick Poets: this author quotes an Anagram on Baron by his friend, John Quarles:

"Ana- { Robertus Baronus } gram.
Rarus Ab Orbe Notus."

Rarus, haud cuiquam peperit Natura Secundum Notus es et scriptis (Baron) ab orbe tuis."

Baron, Robert, professor of divinity in Marischal College, Aberdeen, was the author of Metaphysica Generalis, Lugd. Bat., 1657, which was in great favour with eminent scholars on the continent. He pub. several theological works, 1621-27, and '31. He was elected to the see of Orkney, but was never consecrated, being driven by persecution from Scotland. He died at Berwick.

Barrett, Eaton Stannard, author of several poems, novels, and humorous effusions, the best known of which is The Heroine, or Adventures of Cherubina, a novel in 3 vols., Lon., 1813.

"The idea of this work is not new, since the pernicious effects of indiscriminate novel-reading have been already displayed by Mrs. Lenox in The Female Quixote, and by Miss Charlton in the pleasing story of Rosella; but the present tale is more extravagant than either of those works; and the heroine's cruelty towards her father indisposes the reader for being interested in her subsequent fate. Mr. Barrett may also be censured for not confining his ridicule to allowable subjects: 'what should be great he turns to farce,' both in his frequent sarcasms on the clergy, and in his ludicrous parodies of scenes taken from our best novels: although it might be presumed that, if Cherubina's reading had been limited to respectable works of fiction, or if these had made the chief impression on her mind and memory, she would not have fallen into the follies which she commits. Still, however, her adventures are written with great spirit and humour; and they afford many scenes at which 'To be grave exceeds all power of face.'"—Lon. M. Rev.

The ignorant may dismiss the "System of Occult Philosophy" with a contemptuous laugh, but the student of human nature will naturally feel a desire to investigate the pretensions of a "science" which has turned the brains of so many men of vast learning and unquestioned integrity of purpose.

"As several authors have given an explanation of the signs of the Zodiac, it was to be presumed that Dr. Barrett would attempt to demolish their theories, before he advanced his own; and accordingly, his first pages contain an examination of the systems of Macrobius, La Pluche, and La Nause. In opposing these hypotheses, Dr. B. is more happy than in establishing his own; for, though endowed with much learning, and qualified by much research, he has fallen into the wildest and most fanciful conjectures."—*Lon. Perhaps in no department of letters have there been more important additions to the library than in that which treats of the history, preservation, integrity, and interpretation of the sacred text. Among the new works on this subject, Mr. Barrett's is said to deserve a high place:

"This laborious and learned work is indispensable to the Biblical student. The Hebrew, Greek, and English versions of doubtful passages are given in juxtaposition, and the different opinions of commentators are quoted at length."

"The promiscuous mode of citing authors, we had almost said, concealing authorities, is unworthy a correct or faithful writer."

Barrington, Hon. Daines, 1727-1800, was the fourth of five celebrated sons of an illustrious father, John, Lord Viscount Barrington. He studied for some time at Oxford, which he quitted for the Temple, and was admitted to the bar. He retired from the bench (being a judge in Wales) in 1785, and devoted himself to the study of antiquity, natural history, &c. The fruits of his researches were given to the public in 1766, in his learned Observations on the Statutes, 4to. This work has been frequently reprinted, 1767, '69, '75. 5th edit. 1795. The later editions contain new matter.

"Mr. Barrington, in his Observations, has contributed very much to the elucidation of the more ancient laws of England, by introducing historical illustrations of the times during which the statutes were enacted. The volume abounds in curious, learned, and valuable information."—Baron's Legal Bibl.

"Like an active general in the service of the public, the author storms the strongholds of chicane, wherever they present themselves, and particularly actions, without reserve."

"Mr. Daines Barrington is more of the antiquarian and historian than of the philosopher or lawyer. He has selected from the earliest volume of our statute-book a number of acts, upon which he has given a commentary, curious rather in an antiquarian point of view, than in its illustration of the changes introduced into our legal polity. Many of the statutes commented upon afford an ample field for the display of much research into the manners and customs of the times. Others again throw much light upon the historical events of the period. Upon some occasions the author digresses considerably, but the matter thus introduced is always curious and valuable."—Retrospective Review, vol ix., p. 250: read the whole of this long article.

In 1767 was pub. his Naturalist's Calendar; in 1773 his edit. of the Saxon trans. of Orosius, ascribed to King Alfred. In 1775 appeared his tracts on the Possibility of reaching the North Pole. These tracts were designed to promote a favourite project of Mr. Barrington's, which he had the pleasure of seeing carried out in the voyage of Captain Phipps, afterwards Lord Mulgrave.

"It must be allowed that the learned author bestowed much time and labour on this subject, and accumulated an amazing quantity of written, traditional, and conjectural evidence, in proof of the possibility of circumnavigating the globe; but when his testimonies were examined, they proved rather ingenious than satisfactory."—Chalmers's Biog. Dict.

The edit. of 1818 contains some of Capt. Beaufoy's speculations on the same subject. These tracts are also contained in his Miscellanies on Various Subjects, [Natural History, &c.,] pub. 1781, 4to. Mr. Barrington contributed several papers to the Archæologia, 1770, '75, '77, and to the Phil. Trans., 1767, '71, '73.

Barrington, George, superintendent of the convicts at Parramatta. A Voyage to New South Wales, 1795. Sequel, 1800. The History of New South Wales, 1803, 2 vols. This author was the well known, or, rather, widely known, light-fingered gentleman to whom is ascribed the witty couplet:

"True patriots we! For be it understood,
We left our country for our country's good."

On the voyage out Barrington gained the good-will of the officers of the ship, by assisting so materially to quell a conspiracy of the convicts, that he was considered the preserver of the vessel and the lives of the honest men on board.

"We distrusted the pretensions of the ostensible author [Voyage to N. S. Wales,] being well aware that there are methods of picking pockets unknown, perhaps, to Mr. B., eminent as he has been for skill in the profession. We had doubts whether some ingenious hand had not made free with Mr. B. himself; or, at least, with a name of so much celebrity and promise. On perusing, however, a few pages of the work, our suspicions abated; and before we arrived at its conclusion, not a doubt remained of its authenticity."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Barrington, John Shute, Lord Viscount of the Kingdom of Ireland, 1678-1734, was the youngest son of Benjamin Shute, of London. Francis Barrington, of the ancient house of Barrington in Essex, who had married his cousin-german, Elizabeth Shute, settled upon him his estate in Essex, and, by act of parliament, Mr. Shute was permitted to assume the name and arms of Barrington. He was distinguished at an early age for his talent and judgment.

"One Mr. Shute is named the secretary to Lord Wharton [Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.] He is a young man, but reckoned the shrewdest head in England. . . . As to his principles, he is a moderate man, frequenting the church and meeting indifferently."—DEAN SWIFT.

In 1723 his lordship retired from political life, and devoted himself to theological researches, for which he always cherished a predilection. He married a daughter of Sir William Daines, by whom he had six sons; the five who lived to man's estate all became distinguished characters. 1. William, Lord Barrington; 2. John, a major-general in the army; 3. Daines, justice of Chester; 4. Samuel, an admiral; 5. Shute, Bishop of Durham. Lord Barrington pub. a number of works, 1696-1733, the principal of which is Miscellanea Sacra; or a New Method of considering so much of the History of the Apostles as is contained in Scripture; in an Abstract of their History, an Abstract of that Abstract, and four Critical Essays, Lon., 1725, 2 vols. 8vo. A new edit., under the supervision of the author's son, the Bishop of Durham, in 3 vols., 1770, 8vo. The 1st edit. was pub. anonymously.

"This work contains some very valuable information on subjects not usually discussed. The first essay is on the teaching and witness of the Spirit, and affords some ingenious illustrations of the miraculous gifts of the primitive churches. The second is on the distinction between Apostles, Elders, and Brethren, in which the nature of the apostolic office is particularly examined. The third is on the time when Paul and Barnabas became, and were known to be, apostles; in which he contends that Paul was not constituted an apostle till his second visit to Jerusalem, mentioned Acts xxii. 17-21. The last is on the Apostolical decree. Acts xv. 23-30."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

The 2d edit. contains an Essay on the Several Dispensations of God to Mankind, in the order in which they lie in the Bible; or a Short System of the Religion of Nature and Scripture, 1st edit., 1725. Both works will be found in the Rev. G. Townsend's edit. of Viscount Barrington's works, Lon., 1828, 3 vols.

"Much valuable information may be derived from this work. [An Essay, &c.]"—Quarterly Review.

Dr. Benson acknowledges his obligation to the Miscellanea Sacra, in his history of the first planting of Christianity, and in some other of his works.

"The merit of this work [Miscellanea Sacra] is generally acknowledged."—Rev. T. H. Hornk.

"His theological works will always remain the finest and most durable monument of his literary reputation. Few writers in the last century possessed higher qualifications for the attainment of a profound and extensive knowledge of the Scriptures."—Rev. GEO. TOWNSEND.

Barrington, Sir Jonah, 1767-1834, Judge of the Court of Admiralty in Ireland. Personal Sketches of his Own Time, Lon., 1830, 3 vols. 8vo. Historic Anecdotes and Secret Memoirs relative to the Legislative Union between Great Britain and Ireland, 5 parts, pub. 1809-15, in 4to, at 21s. per part. Published complete in 2 vols. imp. 4to, 1835, with 40 portraits, at £5 5s.

"This remarkable work was begun publishing in parts several years ago, and excited a considerable sensation at the time. It was announced to appear in ten parts, at one guinea each, and several were speedily published. From some unexplained cause, however, the progress of the work was suddenly suppressed, and reports were circulated of its having been officially suppressed on account of the freedom of its language; which gave the published parts a great marketable value, and they could not afterwards be obtained at any price. It remained for that enterprising publisher, Mr. Colburn, to rescue it from being lost to the public, which he did by purchasing the whole materials, after they had been suppressed for several years from the family. The work is now completed as originally intended by the author."

The Historic Memoirs have been issued in cheap form, entitled The Rise and Fall of the Irish Nation.

Barrington, Hon. and Rt. Rev. Shute, 1734-1826, successively Bishop of Llandaff, Salisbury, and Durham, was the sixth son of the first Lord Barrington. (See awc.) He was educated at Eton, and in 1752 became a gentleman-commoner at Merton College, Oxford. His lordship edited in 1770 an edit. of his learned father's Miscellanæ

Sacra, and pub. several sermons, charges, tracts, &c., 1772-1815. He also contributed many valuable notes to the enlarged edition of Bowyer's Conjecture on the New Testament, and prepared for the press the Political Life of his brother William, second Viscount Barrington, which work was edited by Sir Francis Bernard.

"His remarks on the Greek Testament inserted in Bunyan's Critical Conjectures are characterised by sound judgment and great caution. . . His tracts, sermons, and charges, are alike characterised by sound judgment, clearness of expression, and fervent piety."

Barrow, Isaac, D.D., 1630-1677, an eminent mathematician and divine, was born in the city of London. His father was linen-draper to Charles I., whom he followed to Oxford. After the decapitation of his king, he (Thomas Barrow) attended Charles II. in his exile, and continued with him till the Restoration. His brother, Isaac Barrow, uncle to the subject of our memoir, was made Bishop of the Isle of Man. The early youth of Isaac Barrow was unpromising. At the Charter-House School he was remarkable for an uncommonly belligerent disposition, and dealt as hard blows to his schoolfellows as he afterwards directed at the Supremacy of the Pope. His father, wearied with the exercise of unavailing discipline, intimated that the loss of the young warrior would not be a heart-breaking affair, by expressing the opinion that if it pleased Providence to remove any of his children, Isaac could be the best spared from the group. Placed at school at Felstead in Essex, Isaac suddenly assumed a new character;—that of a diligent, persevering student. In 1643 he was admitted a pensioner of Peterhouse, Cambridge, and two years later entered Trinity College. A Latin oration displeasing some of the Fellows, Dr. Hill, the master, replied to their complaints, "Barrow is a better man than any of us." The writings of Lord Bacon, Des Cartes, Galileo, and other profound philosophers, were now his favourite study. In 1649 he commenced B.A.; in 1652 he proceeded M.A.; and in the same year was incorporated in the same degree at Oxford.

He thought at this time of becoming a physician, and studied anatomy, botany, and chemistry. Shortly, however, he resumed the study of divinity. In 1655 he started on a continental tour. The vessel in which he was a passenger being attacked by an Algerine corsair, Barrow assumed carnal weapons, and fought manfully until the pirate was driven off. As we have seen he had a strong natural inclination for hostilities, perhaps he was not sorry for this opportunity of once more taking up the cudgels in a lawful combat. This voyage and combat Barrow has recorded in a long poetical narrative in hexameter and pentameter verse. At Constantinople he read through the works of Chrysostom; this city having been the diocese of the "golden-mouthed" bishop. It was reasonably expected at the time of the Restoration that Barrow would have received immediate preferment; but the profligate, ungrateful monarch, when in the possession of wealth and power, was too much sunk in sensuality and criminal indolence, to make any exertions for the benefit of those who had aided him in the day of adversity. The Egyptian butler is the type of too many in this world,—"yet did he not remember Joseph, but forgot him." It was at this time that Barrow wrote his celebrated epigram:

"Te magis optavit, redditurum, Carole, nemo,

Et nemo sensit, to redisse minus."

"Thy restoration, Royal Charles, I see,

By none more wished, by none less felt, than me."

In 1660 he was chosen professor of Greek at Cambridge. In 1662 he received the appointment of Professor of Geometry, in Gresham College. In 1669 he felt it his duty to apply himself to his profession as a divine. "At his ordination he had vowed to serve God in the gospel of his Son, and he could not make a Bible out of Euclid, nor a pulpit out of his mathematical chair. His only redress was to quit them both." He therefore resigned his professorship at Gresham College to his friend, the afterwards illustrious ISAAC NEWTON. In 1670 he was created doctor of divinity, by royal mandate, and in Feb., 1672, he was promoted to the Mastership of Trinity College, the king observing that he had bestowed it upon "the best scholar in England." In 1675 he was chosen vice-chancellor of his university. The life of this great man was now drawing to a close. In April, 1677, he was attacked by a fever, in London, which terminated fatally on the fourth of May following. As a mathematician, Barrow undoubtedly occupies a very high station, although there is a difference of opinion as to the exact position which it is proper to assign to him. Dr. Pemberton remarks, "He may be esteemed as having shown a compass of invention equal, if not superior, to any of the moderns, Sir Isaac Newton only excepted." It must be remembered that it was at the early age of thirty-two he was chosen professor of geometry; which he resigned seven years later. Had he felt it consistent with his higher obligations, to continue his mathematical researches, it is impossible to predict the progress he might have made in science.

"On Geometry, as a platform, he paved the way, with his theory of Infinitesimal, for the discovery of the Fluxional and Differential Calculi, by Newton and Leibnitz. Barrow originated the idea of what has been called the incremental triangle, and showed the error of his predecessors, in affirming that a portion of a curve may be taken so small that it may, in calculation be considered as a straight line. This notion, although one which the mind readily admits, is utterly untrue, and contradictory to the first principles of geometry. . . Barrow is the author of a work which, in the eyes of sober-minded mathematicians, will always be as classically dear as the orexisia of Euclid were to the school of Alexandria; we mean his Mathematicæ Lectiones, perfect models in the hands of those who are attached to the reasoning of sound geometry."—Roe's Biog. Dic.

His English Theological works collected, first appeared in 3 vols., folio, in 1685, published under the superintendence of Dr. Tillotson and Abraham Hall; several edits., last in 1741. The Opuscula were first published in 1687. His mathematical works appeared: Euclidis Elementa, Cantab., 1655; Euclidis Data, Cantab., 1675; Lectiones Opticæ, Lon., 1669; Lectiones Geometricæ, Lon., 1670; Archimedis Opera; Apollonii Conicorum, Libri IV.; Theodosii Sphærica, Lon., 1675. The following were published after his death: Lectio de Sphæra et Cylindro, Lon., 1678; Lectiones Mathematicæ, 1783.

The English works were republished at the Clarendon Press in 1818, 6 vols. 8vo; again, Oxford, 8 vols. 8vo. Two edits. have been pub. with the Opuscula (first printed in 1687) added. The one edited by the Rev. T. S. Hughes, in 7 vols. 8vo, omits the greater part of Barrow's learned quotations. The other, edited by the Rev. James Hamilton, Edin., 1842, 3 vols. 8vo, "is complete and correctly printed."—Darling's Cyc. Bibl.

Three years later (i. e. in 1845) an excellent edit. was pub. by Mr. John C. Riker of New York, 3 vols. 8vo. This contains all of the works of Barrow, save his mathematical compositions, which are of little use to the general reader. Biographical notices from Hill, Hamilton, &c. are prefixed, and copious indexes add greatly to the value of this creditable edition.

Barrow was a man of great wit. His description of facetiousness has been quoted by Addison, and was considered by Dr. Johnson the finest thing in the language. We quote an instance of his ready wit: Meeting the Earl of Rochester one day, the witty peer exclaimed, "Doctor, I am yours to the shoe-tie;" to which the clergyman replied, "My lord, I am yours to the ground." The peer rejoined, "Doctor, I am yours to the centre." "My lord," retorted the Doctor, "I am yours to the antipodes." Determined not to be outdone, his lordship blasphemously added, "Doctor, I am yours to the lowest pit of hell;" on which Barrow turned on his heel, and said, "And there, my lord, I leave you." Here was true wit, and something much better than wit;—a reproof to a scornful. Of his humanity, we have the following instance on record:

"Walking about the premises of a friend in the evening, he was attacked by a fierce mastiff, which was left unchained at night, and had not become acquainted with the doctor's person. He struggled with the dog, and threw him down; but when on the point of strangling him, he reflected that the animal was only doing his duty in seizing a stranger; for which, therefore, he did not deserve to die. As he durst not loose his hold, lest the dog should seize and tear him, he laid himself down on the animal, and there remained till some one came to his assistance."

Of the Dr.'s extreme neglect of his personal appearance, and the consequences resulting therefrom, we have a ludicrous story in the Biographia Britannica. He was noted for the length of his sermons. His Spital Sermon, or the Duty and Reward of Bounty to the Poor, "took up three hours and a half in its delivery. When asked at its conclusion, if he was not fatigued, he acknowledged that he began to be weary of standing so long!"

"We were once going from Salisbury to London, he, Barrow, in the coach with the Bishop, and I on horseback. As he was entering the coach, I perceived his pockets strutting out near half a foot, and I said to him, 'What have you got in your pockets?' He replied, 'Sermons.' 'Sermons!' said I, 'give them to me; my boy shall carry them in his portmanteau, and ease you of that luggage.' 'But,' said he, 'suppose your boy should be robbed?' 'That is pleasant,' I said; 'do you think there are persons padding on the road for sermons?' 'Why, what have you?' said he. 'It may be five or six guineas,' I answered. Barrow replied, 'I hold my sermons at a greater rate, for they cost me much pains and time.' 'Well then,' said I, 'if you will secure me five or six guineas against luggage, I will secure your sermons against ecclesiastical highwaymen.' This was agreed. He emptied his pockets, and filled my portmanteau with his divinity; and we had the good fortune to come safe to our journey's end, and bring both our treasures to London."—Pope's Life of Ward, p. 143.

When Barrow presented himself with others for examination, as a candidate for the ministry, he gave the following proof of his remarkable readiness. The old prelate proceeded to satisfy himself in a summary way, of the candidates' qualifications, "by addressing in turn to each one, three test questions. Commencing with the first, he asked 'Quid est fides?' to which each answered in turn. Barrow stood last, and when the bishop addressed to him the question, 'Quid est fides?' he received the prompt reply, 'Quod non videt.' The Bishop was a scholar, although age had somewhat benumbed his energy. On receiving this answer, he raised himself in his chair, and looking from whence the answer proceeded, gave vent to his satisfaction in the exclamation 'Excellent!' He then commenced his second round, interrogating each in turn, as before 'Quid est spes?' to which Barrow promptly replied, 'Non dum res!' 'Bene, Bene, excellentius!' rejoined the gratified Bishop, and proceeded to his last question, 'Quid est caritas?' From the others he received various replies, but when Barrow was addressed, he answered, 'Ah, magister, id est paucitas.' 'Excellentissime!' shouted the good old man, unable to suppress his delight, 'aut Erasmus est aut diabolus!'"

At the time of his appointment to the Mastership of Trinity College, influence the most powerful was ready to further his claims, if necessary.

"He was then the King's chaplain in ordinary, and much in favour with the Duke of Buckingham, then Chancellor of the University of Cambridge; as also of Gilbert, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; both of whom were ready, if there had been any need, to have given him their assistance to obtain this place."—Dr. Pope.

"He was in person of the lesser size, and lean; of extraordinary strength, of a fair and calm complexion, a thin skin, very sensible of the cold; his eyes grey, clear, and somewhat short-sighted; his hair of a light asbun, very fine and curling."

See his friend Abraham Hill's letter to Dr. Tillotson, dated April 10, 1683. Hill gives Barrow the most exemplary character, concluding with,

"All I have said, or can say, is far short of the idea which Dr. Barrow's friends have formed of him, and that character which he ought to appear to them who knew him not. Besides all the defects on my part, he had in himself this disadvantage, of wanting fits to augment his lustre, and low places to give eminence to his heights; such virtues as his contentment in all conditions, candour in doubtful cases, moderation among differing parties, knowledge without ostentation, are subjects fitter for praise than narrative."

Another intimate friend, Dr. Pope, tells us,

"He was of a healthy constitution, used no exercise or physic, besides smoking tobacco, in which he was not sparing, saying it was an inutile onium, or panpharmacum. He was unmercifully cruel to a lean carcass, not allowing it sufficient meat or sleep. During the winter months, and some part of the rest, he rose always before it was light, never being without a tinder-box and other proper utensils for that purpose. I have frequently known him, after his first sleep, rise, light, and after burning out his candle, return to bed before day."

His distinguished friend, Archbishop Tillotson, is not a whit behind Abraham Hill in his commendation of our divine:

"Of all the men I ever had the happiness to know, he was the freest from offending in word, coming as near as is possible for human frailty to do, to the perfect idea of St. James, his perfect man."

The names of the two friends are thus beautifully united by Thomson:

"And for the strength and elegance of Truth,
A Barrow and a Tillotson are thine!"—Apost. to Brit.

"It is one of the regrets of his executor, Hill, that he could hear of no enemy and calumny from which to vindicate him. . . . It made little matter where he dwelt—for if he had not friends before him he soon could make them, and he always carried good wishes along with him."—HAMILTON.

Having thus largely considered the character of this excellent man, it is proper that we should speak more particularly than we have yet done of those great works of his which have ever been ranked among the most remarkable productions of the human mind.

Montucla, in his Histoire des Mathematiques, An. VII., tom. II., p. 88, is full of "admiration" and "enchantment" when he speaks of the fertility of ideas and the multitude of new and curious theorems "de ce savant géomètre." The Treatise on the Pope's Supremacy would of itself have placed Barrow in the first class of scholars and controversialists. This he did not live to publish.

"The state of his manuscript, preserved in Trinity College Library, indicates the prodigious pains which he had bestowed upon it, chiefly in the compilation of authorities. As it is, no one can open it at any page without being struck by its amazing research. Yet Barrow was not satisfied with what he had already quoted. Many confirmatory passages were still in his mind, for the insertion of which he had left blank spaces at the time. When on his death-bed, he placed the whole in the hands of Dr. Tillotson, saying, 'I hope it is indifferent perfect, though not altogether as I intended it, if God had granted me longer life.' Had he himself not indicated those omissions, no one could have detected them."—HAMILTON.

Archbishop Tillotson observes:

"No argument of moment, nay hardly any consideration properly belonging to it, hath escaped his large and comprehensive mind. He hath said enough to silence the controversy forever, and to deter all wise men, of both sides, from meddling any further with it."

Hamilton remarks: "What the Archbishop has said about its arguments is equally true of its testimonies."

"We can imagine nothing whereunto to liken the glorious work of Barrow, but the mighty telescope of Herschel—an instrument which brings up, from the abyss of space, a countless multitude of luminaries, which hid themselves from the search of unaided vision. Even so does the gigantic labour of Barrow call up from the depths of antiquity a galaxy of witnesses, who pass over our field of view in perfect order and distinctness, and shed a broad and steady illumination over the path of the inquirer."—British Critic.

"Barrow, not so extensively learned as Taylor, who had read rather too much, but inferior, perhaps, even in that respect to hardly any one else, and above him in closeness and strength of reasoning, combated against Rome in many of his sermons, and especially in a long treatise on papal supremacy. . . . The sermons of Barrow display a strength of mind, a comprehensiveness and fertility, which have rarely been equalled. No better proof can be given than his eight sermons on the government of the tongue; copious and exhaustive, without tautology or superfluous declamation, they are in moral preaching what the best parts of Aristotle are in ethical philosophy, with more of development and more extensive observation. . . . His quotations from ancient philosophers, though not so numerous as in Taylor, are equally unobtrusive to our ears. In his style, notwithstanding its richness and occasional vivacity, we may censure a redundancy and excess of apposition: his language is more antiquated and formal than that of his age; and he abounds too much in uncommon words of Latin derivation, frequently such as appear to have no authority but his own. His Latin verse is forcible and full of mind, but not sufficiently redolent of antiquity."—HALLAM.

Chas. II. used to call Barrow an "Unfair preacher, because he exhausted every topic, and left no room for any thing new to be said by any one who came after him."

Similar to this is the criticism of Le Clerc:

"Les sermons de cet Auteur sont plutôt des Traités, ou les Dissertationes exactes, que de simples Harangues pour plaire à la multitude."—Bib. Universelle, tome iii. p. 325.

Dr. Pope, his intimate friend, had anticipated this critique.

"He thought he had not said enough, if he omitted any thing that belonged to the subject of his discourse; so that his sermons seemed rather complete treatises, than orations designed to be spoke in an hour."

Coleridge complains that

"Barrow often debased his language merely to evidence his loyalty. It was, indeed, no easy task for a man of so much genius, and such a precise mathematical mode of thinking, to adopt, even for a moment, the slang of L'Estrange and Tom Brown; but he succeeded in doing so sometimes. With the exception of such arts, Barrow must be considered as closing the first great period of the English language. Dryden began the second."

We must not forget the commendation of the Lectiones Opticæ, conveyed in a letter of James Gregory, the Scottish Mathematician, to John Collins. Several years after publication, Barrow had heard of only two men who had given them a careful perusal,—Susius of Liege, and James Gregory; the latter thus writes:

"Mr. Barrow in his optics sheweth himself a most subtle geometer, so that I think him superior to any that ever I looked upon. I long exceedingly to see his Geometrical Lectures, especially because I have some notions upon that subject by me. I entreat you to send them to me presently, as they come from the press, for I esteem the author more than you can imagine."

The author informs us that the publication of these Lectures was urged by his pupil, the afterwards illustrious Isaac Newton. "D. ISAACUS NEWTON, COLLEGA NOSTER, PEREGREGIÆ VIR INDOLIS AC INSIGNIS PERITILÆ," had revised the text, and not only suggested some corrections, but supplied some important additions from his own store.

His execution given us an instance of the ardour with which he prosecuted a study once begun, he found written at the end of his copy of Apollonius—"April 14-Mai 14, semper hoc tempore intervalla peroratio mea opus."

"The school of Hooker, Chillingworth, Hume, and Barrow, in the school of acute perception and close reasoning. Yet Barrow was perhaps the most able of the four writers just named, not only in the systematic division, and masterly classification of the various subjects of which he treats, but in the copiousness of his ideas and his language. There is a power and probability of expression in many of Barrow's discourses, as if the writer were conscious of the inferiority of his vernacular tongue to convey precisely the views and bearings of his thought. His sermon on the divine is one of the most astonishing instances, which present themselves to my memory of an eloquence so powerful and persuasive as his ideas are original and sublime."—Dr. Duffin

Bishop Hober, speaking of Taylor, Hooker, and Barrow, thus distinguishes them:

"Of such a vigorousness, who shall call the pre-consumers? The first was most, the second consummation, the third delights and sustains most. To Barrow the grade must be assigned of the clearest and deepest view, and of the most controlled and chastened."

The Rev. R. Dickson adds,

"Hooker was more correct in doctrine, Barrow more full in practical instruction, and Taylor most rich in devotional contemplation. The powers of Barrow's mind were of the highest order, and in his sermons on the person of Christ, and on his incarnation, we have very able statements of the fundamental truths of the gospel, and his treatment on the Pope's Supremacy has been said to be the most valuable on that topic in the English language. In his sermons on Faith there are some magnificent passages, but there are others in which we cannot avoid though he distinctly acknowledges it to be a fruit of the Spirit. His sermons on industry are admirable as comprehending a very valuable mass of weighty and important matter for industry in general and in our callings as Christians, scholars, and gentlemen. It is a book which may be read through more than once with much advantage, almost every page relating to the subject seems directed, and almost every text quoted, but we are not evangelical motives fully developed. In such a sermon as his on the Passion, we are glad to sit at his feet and learn the very best lessons."

Robt. Hall, in his Review of Gibberne's Sermons, refers to the "Extraordinary merits of Barrow, who has cultivated Christian morals with an universal acclamation of the English public. We admire, as much as it is possible for our readers to admire, the rich invention, the marvellous force, the exuberant copiousness, yet precise and energetic diction, which distinguished Barrow who by a rare facility of genius, united to himself the most distinguishing qualities of the mathematician and the orator. We are astonished at combining in the same person, and in the same composition, the clear logic of Aristotle, combined with the amplifying powers of Plato."

We find an admirable notice of Barrow in Dugald Stewart's Prelim. Disc. to the Encycl. Britannica:

"At this era, it is impossible to see a man whose logical works, methodical, and by a vigorous, and in every way marks of the systematic have secured to him. As a writer, he is equally in matter and by the profoundness of his particularly characteristic and of accurate facility of criticism. Whether the subject treated, he always seems to enjoy to the extreme, and at difficulties, puts forth but precisely sufficient labour on the author's

"Lectures on Optics, delivered at Cambridge in 1684, which treated of all the more difficult questions which had occurred to that state of the science, with the accuracy and depth which are found in all the writings of that gentleman."

"No man that reads Dr Barrow on any subject which he has handled, need wish his invention for topics upon which to speak, or his arguments to make those topics good."—Dr. Warton

"He pushed his inquiries to the very verge or confines of which they are capable of being pushed, and his works afford a sort of logical Encyclopedia. He had the clearest head with which man's mind ever endowed an individual, and one of the purest and most accomplished hearts that ever beat."

"Barrow's Sermons are too well known to require description. For profundity of thought and brilliancy of treatment, for bold and majestic language, for parallel beauty and propriety of description, for great strength of argument and ingenuity and originality of expression, they are perhaps unrivalled in the English language, or in any other."

"Dr. Barrow's Sermons are master-pieces of the kind."—Locke

Bishop Warburton remarked that "in reading Barrow, he was obliged to think." The great Earl of Chatham, when in early life qualifying himself for public speaking, read Barrow's Sermons again and again, till he could recite many of them memoriter. He recommended his son, the younger Pitt, to study them frequently and deeply. It was probably the example of these great men which caused the late Daniel Webster, one of the most prominent of American statesmen, to be so frequent a reader of these extraordinary specimens of reasoning, eloquence, profundity, and perspicuity, combining the knowledge of the Danish blade with the weight of the Highland clay-mora.

We do not wonder that infidelity was put to rest, and the enemy abashed by the public capture of the worthlessness of the armour wherein he trusted.

"In Barrow we shall remark the distinctive aspects of eloquence existing in the highest form. If we look for a mainly and fervid eloquence, for a mighty and sustained power, kept under control by the correct logic, for a peculiar quality of mastery and vigor to which all looks appear equally easy, we may point with pride to the writings of Barrow. He is an admirable specimen of a class of men who fortunately for the political, literary and the theological glory of England, have adorned her two great seats of learning, Oxford and Cambridge, at almost every period of her history. Freed from east, cold and diversified learning, with precision and exactness in the affairs of real life covered and reinforced philosophical by retirement and meditation, with the intense and concentrated industry of the monk, guided by the mass of utility of the man of the world, these vigorous scholars were peculiarly adapted by Providence to become firm and majestic pillars of such an ecclesiastical establishment as the Church of England. 'Blessed be she' we may venture to apply the words of Scripture—'for she has her quiver full of them.'—Prof. Shaw's Outline of English Literature

"He was uttered a most memorable statement, which characterized both the intellectual and moral constitution of his school—would that it could be engraven on the mind of every youth, on his guide through life—'A scholar's life is a constant in unbroken as well as in adversity.'—Channing's Camp of the Lit.

In an article in the Quarterly Review, vol. xxi., on Pulpit Eloquence, we have a very satisfactory explanation of the exuberant character of Barrow's Sermons, which was referred to by Chas. II. when he called him an "unfair preacher."

"At the Reformation, men's minds were weary of religious, as well as civil, turbulence. The country had been so long distracted by the multiplicity of sects, all equally fierce and intolerant, that reason was the prevailing wish of almost all parties. There was wanted therefore, a writer who, as it were, once for all, should answer every question to the bottom with laborious impartiality, who should lay it in all its possible bearings before the understanding; who should not merely confute every error, but trace it to its origin, and detect its secret operation on the mind, who should, in short, estimate as it were, theology. Such a preacher was Barrow. Endowed with an acuteness which could penetrate every subject, with a shrewd and precision of definition more nearly approaching than any other modern, except perhaps Bacon, to Aristotle, with a copiousness and variety of language, which enabled him to survey to the mind with the utmost propriety the most intricate difficulties. Barrow added to all this some of the yet unattainable warmth which had animated his predecessors, and is occasionally glowing, vehement, impassioned."

The following eloquent eulogium on our author is from the same able periodical:

"Never was the English student of theology so weary of the study of Barrow. The greatest man of our church—the exponent image of his doctrine and spirit—the model (we do not hesitate to say) without a fault—a perfect master of the art of reasoning, yet aware of the limits to which reason should be confined, not violating it with the authority of an angel, and now again stamping it before the deep things of God with the humility of a child—altogether removed from the Portent of his own generation, and the Rationalist of the generation which surrounded him—no politician, no infidel, no full of faith, yet free from superstition, a steadfast believer in a particular Providence, in the efficacy of human prayer, in the active influence of God's Spirit, but without one word of the visionary. Conscious of the deep corruption of our nation, though still thinking he could discover in it some traces of God's image in reason and order, a lively sense of the consequences of this corruption, resting himself altogether upon God's mercy through the sufferings of a Saviour for the redemption of that day which he desired with a strong desire to obtain with, when his mind purged and his eye clear he should be permitted to behold and understand without the labour and intervention of slow and successive thought, not this our system alone, but more and more excellent things than this."

We have devoted more space than we intended to the works of this great man. But which of our readers will blame us? Exalted as is our theme, it stands not upon its own merits alone. Great as is the name of Barrow, it is as but one of the lesser gods who announce the coming of one far mightier, before whom all subordinate powers bow in lowly reverence. Barrow was the most conspicuous star that had arisen in that twilight dawning which preceded the full burst of a new day of scientific truth, but as the brightest star must pale before the glory of the sun when he "goes forth in his strength," so must the fame of Barrow give place to the mighty name of Newton.

In imagination we are carried some two centuries back, and in the classical hall of Trinity College we behold, in studious converse, a tutor who softens the austerity of instruction with the benignity of parental interest, and a pale-faced youth, whose ductile mind gladly receives those seeds of knowledge, which, by the richness of the soil, it shall shortly reproduce, augmented a hundred fold. You! here is the "Immo Newton of our college," as Barrow affectionately styles him—"peragrinum vir indolis ac ingenio peritum."

Then hast read him well, philosopher! Thy master is before thee in that modest tyro, who now drinks in every accent of thy words of wisdom. Thy place shall be given to one greater than thou; yet shalt thou be highly exalted in the noble office of making known to a perishing world the glad tidings of eternal life, through the proclamation of the everlasting gospel. The scholar assumed the mathematical chair, when his master, who had resigned it in his favour, ascended the pulpit. Between such men, the idea of rivalry is out of place. They laboured for one end, they advanced the same cause, though in different departments of the Master's vineyard.

The distinguished tutor and his illustrious pupil, ISAAC NEWTON and ISAAC BARROW, the philosopher-divine and the divine-philosopher, the one from the scientific chair, and the other from the sacred desk, served their generation as chosen expositors of the ways of Providence and the revelation of His word; and their recorded teachings shall, to remotest times and as yet unpeopled regions, declare the "wonderful works of God."

Barrow, Sir John, 1764-1848, distinguished himself by his scientific acquirements and his valuable accounts of Travels and Voyages. As private secretary to Sir George Staunton, who accompanied the Earl of Macartney to his expedition to China, and as under-secretary to the Admiralty, he enjoyed peculiar advantages for personal observation and access to the recorded experience of others. Parry and Franklin have been much indebted to the suggestions of Sir John Barrow, and most of the scientific expeditions that have been undertaken by England for the last twenty years have been referred to Sir John for approval. His work on Cochin China has been translated (!) into French by Malte Brun. De Guignes wrote a treatise on one of his works, entitled Observations sur les voyages de Barrow à la Chine. See Georgian Era. A work on Mathematical Drawing Instruments, Lon., 1790. "An admirable piece of biography, which should be perused by every Englishman glowing with the love of his country, and be placed in the hands of every youth destined for the naval profession. There had previously been no even tolerable life of this great hero of the glorious first of June. The new materials at the disposal of Sir John Barrow, consisted of Earl Howe's journal, during all the time his flag was up—upwards of four hundred letters in his own hand-writing, and many addressed to him by royal and official persons, as well as by his private friends; and, as may be supposed, the author's station and long experience as Secretary of the Admiralty have opened for him all our Government repositories, and qualified him to make an excellent use of whatever these or other sources afforded him."—*Lon. We have often looked anxiously for a life of Anson; particularly as we know that amongst officers of the navy, this blank in their professional literature was much lamented. It is a piece of good fortune both to the service and the country, that the task has fallen into the hands of one so pre-eminently competent as well by his position as by his scientific knowledge and literary talents."—Edinburgh Review.

"Sir John Barrow undertakes his task in a manner which must set every reader at ease. Possessing—not idly boasting—a mens sana in corpore sano—bearing testimony, throughout his narrative, to the honourable and healthy influences of work, and to the certainty with which energy and self-improvement will advance the fortunes of one lowly born—we have rarely looked into a record of eighty years which chronicles so much of prosperity and happiness. Barry, Girald, usually called Giraldus Cambrensis, or Girald of Wales, was born about 1146, and is supposed to have died about the year 1223. His father, William de Barri, was a powerful Norman baron, his mother was a descendant of the princes of South Wales. His education was completed at the University of Paris, where he studied for three years, and proved his natural genius and assiduity in study by his famous lectures on rhetoric and polite literature. Returning to England in 1172, he entered into holy orders, and obtained several benefices in England and Wales. Upon the death of his uncle, David Fitz-Gerald, Bishop of St. David's, who had directed his early studies, the chapter made choice of Giraldus as his successor; but the opposition of King Henry II. prevented this promotion. Hereupon Giraldus, in 1176, returned to Paris, and renewed his studies in theology, and in the civil and canon law, paying especial attention to the decretals, or papal constitutions. In 1180 he again visited England, and in 1185, whilst acting as secretary and privy counsellor to Prince (afterwards King) John, who was at this time in Ireland, he commenced collecting the materials for his Topographia Hiberniæ, which he completed in 1187. In this year he read this work, the three books, on three successive days, before a public audience at Oxford. Knowing that men are accessible in other ways than through love of letters, he gave sumptuous entertainments one day to the poor of the town, the second day to the doctors and scholars of celebrity, and the third day to the scholars of lower rank, the soldiers, townsmen, and burghesses.

Giraldus is not at all too modest to inform us of his uniform success as a disputant, and of the marvellous effects of his eloquence. So great he assures us was the latter, that those who were ignorant of the Latin or French, in which he addressed them, were still moved to tears by his orations!

In 1198 Peter de Leia, preferred by the choice of Henry II. to the bishopric of St. David's, in place of Giraldus, was removed by death, and again Giraldus was elected, but the Archbishop of Canterbury refused to accept the nomination. The chapter again elected him, and Giraldus visited Rome to plead on their behalf. The pope decided against the bishop-elect in 1203, and Geoffrey de Henlawe was elected Bishop of St. David's. Thus disappointed, he renounced all ambitious hopes, and devoted himself to literary composition. When overtures were made to him in 1215 to accept of the again vacant see of St. David's, he judged it best under the circumstances of the case to decline all advances. He finished two of his most important works, De Principis Instructione, and the Speculum Ecclesiæ, in 1210, in which year he also revised a second edition of the dialogues of the church of St. David's. Tanner quotes a document which states that in 1223 the church of Chesterton in Oxfordshire was vacant "by the death of Master G. de Barri," from which we presume this to have been the date of his death. Giraldus was undoubtedly one of the brightest ornaments of his age.

"Noble in his birth, and comely in his person; mild in his manners, and affable in his conversation; zealous, active, and undaunted in maintaining the rights and dignities of his church; moral in his character, and orthodox in his principles; charitable and disinterested, though ambitious; learned, though superstitious: such was Giraldus. And in whatever point of view we examine the character of this extraordinary man, whether as a scholar, a patriot, or a divine, we may justly consider him as one of the brightest luminaries that adorned the annals of the twelfth century."

So writes Sir Richard Colt Hoare, who, in 1806, pub. in two splendid quarto volumes, the Itinerary of Archbishop Baldwin through Wales, A. D. 1188, by Giraldus de Barri; translated into English, and illustrated with views, annotations, and a life of Giraldus.

Giraldus was a voluminous author: his own list consists of

1. The Chronography and Cosmography in Latin hexameters and pentameters. Not known to be in existence.
2. The Topographia Hiberniæ, in 3 books, printed Frankfurt, 1602, and in Hollinshed.
3. The Expugnatio Hiberniæ, sive Historia Vaticinalis; an Account of the Norman Conquest of Ireland, being a sequel to the preceding work.

"The many invectives contained in it against Ireland, and the natives of it, the fables with which it abounded, and the gross errors through the whole, alarmed many of the Irish, and set their pens a-going."

Archbishop Usher's opinion is highly favourable: "Virum Antiquitatum, non Hiberniæ solum sue, sed aliarum etiam gentium scientissimum."

4. Legends of Saints. Some of these lives have been printed in Wharton's Anglia Sacra.
5. The Life of Geoffrey, Archbishop of York. Printed by Wharton. Compiled in 1193.
6. Symbolum Electorum. Not printed.
7. Liber Invectionum.
8. Speculum duorum communitorum et consolatorum. Both of these books are supposed to be lost.
9. Gemma Ecclesiastica.
10. The Itinerary of Cambria.
11. The Topographia Cambriæ, in 2 books. The 1st only was printed in the earliest editions. The 2d was first printed in the Anglia Sacra.
12. De Fidei Fructu Adeli-que Defectu; which is lost.
13. De Principis Instructione.
14. De Gestis Giraldi Laboriosis.
15. De Jure et Statu Menevensis ecclesiæ.

The above (from Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.) complete Giraldus's own list; but the Speculum Ecclesiæ, one of his latest and most remarkable productions, must be added.

Bartholomæus Anglicus, or Glanvil, flourished about 1360. He was of the family of the Earls of Suffolk, and by profession a Franciscan monk. He pursued his studies at Oxford, Paris, and Rome, paying especial attention to the writings of Aristotle, Plato, and Pliny. The result of his learned investigations (besides articles of less note) was his celebrated work in Latin, De Proprietatibus Rerum, which is composed of 19 dissertations, upon the Supreme Being, angels, devils, the soul, the body, animals, &c. In some copies there is an additional book not of his composition. Glanvil was largely indebted to the Speculum Naturale of Beauvais. This work was very popular, and translations were made into the English, French, Dutch, and Spanish languages. For an account of the various editions and for other works of this author, see Bale, Tanner, Brunet, Watt, Lowndes, &c. John Trevisa's translation into English is the most splendid production of the press of Wynkyn de Worde, (circa anno.) Barton. Italian Grammar, Lon., 1719.

Barton, Benjamin Smith, M.D., 1766-1815, an eminent physician, botanist, and philologist, was the son of the Rev. Thomas Barton, an Episcopal minister, a native of Ireland, who emigrated to America and in 1753 married at Philadelphia a sister of Mr. David Rittenhouse. The subject of our memoir was born at Lancaster, Pennsylvania. He pursued his studies for some years in New York and Philadelphia; and in 1786 went to Edinburgh, where for about two years he enjoyed the great advantage of hearing the lectures of Professors Walker, Gregory, Black, and Home. He obtained his medical degree at Gottingen. In 1789 he returned to Philadelphia, and in the same year was appointed professor of Natural History and Botany in the College of Philadelphia, and continued to occupy the chair, when, in 1791, the college was incorporated with the University of Pennsylvania. He continued his connection with this institution until his death in 1815. In 1795 he succeeded Dr. Griffith in the chair of Materia Medica; and upon the death of Dr. Rush in 1813, he was appointed his successor in the chair of the practice of Physic, which he held in conjunction with that of Botany and Natural History, during his life. In 1809 he was elected President of the Phila. Medical Society. In 1797 he married a daughter of Edward Penington, Esq., an eminent citizen of Philadelphia, by whom he had one son and a daughter.

Edward Penington was a descendant of the celebrated Isaac Penington of London, whose father was lord mayor in 1642. (See PENINGTON, ISAAC, in this volume.) His family at the present day, (1854,) after the lapse of two centuries, is one of the first in America. From John Penington, Esq., of Philadelphia, (grandson to the father-in-law of Dr. Barton,) well known for his erudition and literary taste, we learn that the subject of our memoir was taught to draw by Major Andre, at the time a prisoner of war in Lancaster. See PENINGTON, JOHN.

Dr. Barton united untiring industry with great natural talents, a warm zeal in scientific investigation, and uncommon attainments in many branches of knowledge. At the age of 16, Barton composed an Essay on the Vices of the Times. Thus early did he assume the position of a teacher!

Observations on some parts of Natural History, to which is prefixed an account of several remarkable vestiges of an ancient date, which have been discovered in different parts of North America. Part I., Lon., 1787, 8vo, Dilly. This was pub., it will be noticed, whilst the author was resident in London. It was not continued. It relates to antiquities, giving an account of the Indian ruins in the Muskingum, with some remarks on the first peopling of America.

"A prefixed advertisement to this work informs us that it is the production of a very young man, written chiefly as a recreation from the laborious studies of medicine. It is, however, a curious tract: we have here only the first part: the other three, which will complete the work, are to be published in a few months."—Lon. Monthly Review.

In 1805 he commenced the Med. and Physical Journal, to which he contributed many articles of value. For further information respecting Dr. Barton and his works, see Biog. Sketch by his nephew, W. P. C. Barton, M.D., etc.; Rose's Biog. Diet., and Thacher's Med. Biog.

Barton, Bernard, 1784-1849, often called THE QUAKER POET, was born in the vicinity of London. In 1810 he obtained a clerkship in the Messrs. Alexander's bank at Woodbridge, which situation he held for the rest of his life. At one time he thought of resigning his post and devoting himself entirely to literature; but his friend Charles Lamb interposed a timely remonstrance.

Mr. Barton's first volume of poems was pub. in 1811. He wrote much,—his poems filling eight or nine volumes. His Household Verses, a collection of his fugitive pieces, pub. in 1845, "contain more of his personal feelings than perhaps any previous work of his pen." Mr. Barton was remarkable for great amiability of manners, extensive information, and a refined taste in the arts. Of the English drama his knowledge, as may be supposed, was limited:

"I am amused with your knowledge of our drama being confined to Shakespeare and Miss Bailie. What a world of fine territory between Land's End and Johnny Groat's have you missed traversing! I could almost envy you to have so much to read. . . Oh, to forget Fielding, Steele, &c., and read 'em new!"—Charles Lamb to E. B., Dec. 1822.

Lord Byron thought highly of Barton's poetical talents, but did not hesitate to proffer the same advice which Lamb had given:

"I think more highly of your poetical talents than it would perhaps gratify you to have expressed; for I believe, from what I observe of your mind, that you are above flattery. To come to the point, you deserve success; but we knew before Addison wrote his Cato, that desert does not always command it. But suppose it attained,

'You know what ill the author's life assail,
Toll, envy, want, the patron, and the jail.'
Do not renounce writing, but never trust entirely to authorship."—Byron to Barton, June, 1812.

"I have read your poems with much pleasure, those with most which speak most of your own feelings."—R. Southey to Barton, Dec. 1814.

In 1820 Mr. Barton requested Southey's opinion whether the Society of Friends were likely to be offended at his publishing a volume of poems. We give a short extract from Southey's reply:

"I know one, a man deservedly respected by all who know him, (Charles Lloyd the elder, of Birmingham,) who has amused his old age by translating Horace and Homer. He is looked up to in the society, and would not have printed these translations if he had thought it likely to give offence. Judging, however, from the spirit of the age, as affecting your society, like every thing else, I should think they would be gratified by the appearance of a poet among them who confines himself within the limits of their general principles. They will not like virtuous feeling and religious principle the worse for being conveyed in good verse. If poetry in itself were unlawful, the Bible must be a prohibited book." (See an amusing letter of Barton's to Southey, respecting the fitness of the latter to be the biographer of George Fox.)

The volume appeared, and was highly commended: "The staple of the whole poem is description and meditation,—description of quiet home scenery, sweetly and feelingly wrought out; and meditation, overshadowed with tenderness, and exalted by devotion,—but all terminating in soothing, and even cheerful, views of the condition and prospects of mortality."—Edin. Rev.

Wilson reviews Barton in vol. xii. of Blackwood: "He possesses much sensibility, and his mind has a strong tinge of poetry. Every now and then he surprises us with glimpses of something infinitely better than the general tone of his conceptions."

"If we cannot compliment Mr. Barton on being naturally a great poet, he possesses feeling, has long studied his art, and has attained to a point of merit which we did not anticipate."—Lon. Monthly Review, 1820.

"There is in Barton's poems a higher beauty than the beauty of ingenuity, and something of more worth than the exquisiteness of workmanship. His works are full of passages of natural tenderness, and his religious poems, though animated with a warmth of devotion, are still expressed with that subdued propriety of language, which evinces at once a correctness of taste and feeling."—Lon. Genl. Mag.

"A man of a fine and cultivated, rather than of a bold and original, mind."—LORD JEFFERY.

The Widow's Tale, and other Poems.

"We should always rejoice to see this volume on any table."—Lon. Literary Gazette, March, 1827.

"This interesting little volume contains some of the sweetest poetry Mr. Barton has ever written."—Lon. Lit. Magnet, April, 1827.

Devotional Verses. "Mr. Barton's style is well suited to devotional poetry. It has great sweetness and pathos, accompanied with no small degree of power, which well qualify it for the expression of the higher and purer feelings of the heart."—Lon. New Monthly Mag., March, 1826.

Mr. Barton was a brother to Maria Hack, the authoress of a number of juvenile works of great merit, and his daughter, Miss Lucy Barton, has devoted her talents to the composition of scriptural works, principally intended for the young.

Barton, Thomas, 1730–1780, an Episcopal minister, a native of Ireland, received his education at the University of Dublin. In 1753 he married at Philadelphia the sister of Dr. David Rittenhouse. To this eminent philosopher, his talents and extensive acquirements enabled him to render invaluable assistance. He officiated in Reading Township, York County, Pennsylvania, as a missionary of a society in England from 1755 to 1759. He was a chaplain in the expedition against Fort Du Quesne in 1758. His acquaintance with Washington, Mercer, and other distinguished officers of the Revolution, proved no bar to his continued adherence to the royal government. Refusing to take an oath required of him, he removed in 1778 to New York, where he died, May 25, 1780. His eldest son, Wm. Barton of Lancaster, wrote the memoirs of Rittenhouse; Professor Benj. Smith Barton, M.D., was another of his eight children. His widow continued to reside with her nephew, the excellent Samuel Bard, M.D., (see ante), until her death in 1821. Bartram, John, 1701–1777, an eminent botanist, was born at Marple, Delaware co., Pennsylvania. He took great pleasure in the care of a botanical garden, laid out and planted by himself, on the west bank of the Schuylkill, four miles below Philadelphia. He became so famous for his proficiency in his favourite pursuit, that Linnaeus pronounced him "the greatest natural botanist in the world." Sir Hans Sloane, Mr. Catesby, Dr. Hill, Peter Collinson, and other friends of science, furnished Bartram with books and apparatus, stimulated his zeal by their sympathy, and aided his labours by active co-operation.

"Be so kind as to give him [Bartram] a little entertainment and recommendation to a friend or two of yours in the country, for he does not value riding 50 or 100 miles to see a new plant."—Peter Collinson to Col. Oustis, of Virginia, 1737.

He received the appointment of American Botanist to George III., which office he held until his death in September, 1777. Mr. Bartram also contributed several papers to the Phil. Trans., 1740, '44, '50, '62, '63. See an interesting volume entitled Memoirs of John Bartram and Humphrey Marshall, Phila., 1849, by William Darlington, M.D., of West Chester, Pennsylvania; also a sketch of the life of Peter Collinson, by Wm. Bartram, William, 1739–1823, son of John Bartram, (ante), inherited the botanical zeal of his father. In 1773, at the request of Dr. Fothergill, he travelled through several of the Southern States, &c. in order to examine the natural productions of the country. These investigations occupied him for five years. His collections and drawings were forwarded to Dr. Fothergill. The fruits of this enterprise were given to the world in 1791: Travels through N. and S. Carolina, Georgia, E. and W. Florida, the Cherokee Country, the extensive Territories of the Muscogules or Creek Confederacy, and the country of the Choctaws; containing an Account of the Soil and Natural Productions of those Regions, together with Observations on the Manners of the Indians. Embellished with copper-plates, 8vo, map and 16 plates, Phila., 1791; pub. in Lon., in 1792, and again in 1794. In the English edition only 8 of the 16 plates, principally of plants, are given. In 1799 it was trans. into French by P. V. Benoist, Paris, 1801, 2 vols. 8vo.

"It is a delightful specimen of the enthusiasm with which the lover of nature, and particularly the botanist, surveys the beautiful and wonderful productions which are scattered over the face of the earth."

In Thurlow's State Papers will be found many of his letters to Chancellor Hyde. Some of these epistles were intercepted, and although written in cipher, were understood, whereas the Chancellor expresses great amazement:

"I was confident that the Devil himself cannot decypher a letter that is well written, or find that 100 stands for Sir Harry Vane. I have heard of many of the pretenders to that skill, and have spoken with some of them, but have found them all to be Mountebanks."—Hyde to Barwick.

Barwick, Peter, M.D., 1619-1705? brother to the preceding, and physician in ordinary to King Charles II., composed a life of his brother John (noticed in preceding article) which has been much admired for the elegance of its Latinity. He wrote a Defence of Harvey's Discovery of the Circulation of the Blood, which was considered one of the best pieces of the controversy. He was also author of a treatise appended to the life of his brother, in favour of the Eikon Basilikè, (in opposition to Dr. Walker,) and pub. a medical work under the title of Medicorum Animos exagitant, Londini, 1671, 4to.

We see that judicial astrology was not despised by our philosopher; to this branch of his studies Sir James Melvil refers, when he states that his brother, Sir Robert, while he was using his endeavours to reconcile the two Queens, Elizabeth and Mary, met with one Bassantin, a man learned in the high sciences, who told him that all his labour would be in vain.

"For they will never meet together; and next, there will never be any thing but dissembling and secret hatred, for a while; and at length, captivity and utter wreck to our Queen from England. . . . The kingdom of England at length shall fall, of right, to the crown of Scotland; but it shall cost many bloody battles; and the Spaniards shall be helpers, and take a part to themselves for their labour."—Memoirs.

Basse, J. H. Catechism of Health, Lon., 1794, 12mo.

Basse, William, a minor poet, temp. James I., wrote an epitaph (probably the first) upon the Poetess Shakespeare; printed in 1633 in the 1st edit. of Dr. Donne's poems. That Which Seems Best is Worst, has been ascribed to him, (Restituta, vol. i. 41.), and in 1651 he contemplated pub. a volume of his poems.

Bassol, John, d. 1347, a Scotch philosopher, studied divinity under Duns Scotus at Oxford. His preceptor had so high an opinion of his pupil that he used to say, "If John Bassol be present, I have a sufficient auditory." In 1304 he accompanied his master to Paris. Commentaria seu Lecturae in quatuor Libros Sententiarum, Paris, 1517, fol.; a work in such high reputation as to procure him from his brethren, the schoolmen, the title of "Doctor Ordinatusissimus," in allusion to his method and perspi-cuity. Miscellanea Philosophica et Medica, in the same volume.

Bastard, Thomas, d. 1618, a clergyman, and an epigrammatist of considerable note in his day, was made perpetual Fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1588.

"But being much guilty of the vices belonging to poets, and given to libelling, he was in a manner forced to leave his fellowship in 1591."—Wood.

The "libel" which gave so much offence was "upon all persons of note in Oxford who were guilty of amorous exploits." It was entitled An Admonition to the city of Oxford, &c. Bastard disclaimed the authorship. After his expulsion he wrote, Jenkin, why man? why Jenkin? He, for shame! Neither of these were printed. He pub. Chrestoleros; seven bookes of Epigrams, Lon., 1598, 12mo. — See Censura Literaria, vol. iv. Magna Britannia, a Latin Poem, in three books, Lon., 1605, 4to. Five Sermons, Lon., 1615, 4to. Twelve Sermons, Lon., 1615, 4to. Bastard was thrice married.

"He was a person endowed with many rare gifts, was an excellent Grecian, Latinist, and poet, and, in his elder years, a quaint preacher. His discourses were always pleasant and facetious, which made his company desired by all ingenious men. He was a most excellent epigrammatist, and, being always ready to versify upon any subject, did let nothing material escape his fancy, as his compositions, running through several hands in MS., shew."—Alcen. Oxon.

Warton speaks of him as an elegant classic scholar, and "better qualified for that species of the occasional pointed Latin epigram established by his fellow-collegian, John Owen, than for any other sort of English versification." The res angusta domi, however,—to which poets are so proverbially subject—would appear to have sobered his wit:

"But now, left naked of prosperity,
And subject unto bitter injurie;
So poor of sense, so bare of wit I am,
Not neede herselfe can drive an epigram."

—Lib. i., Epig. 2.

We extract a stanza from an Epigram in honour of our author by no less a person than Sir John Harrington:

"To Master Bastard, a minister, that made a pleasant Book of English Epigrams:

You must in pulpit treat of matters serious;
As it becomes the person and the place;
There preach of faith, repentance, hope, and grace;
Of sacraments, and such high things mysterious:
But they are too severe, and too imperious,
That unto honest sports will grant no space.
For those our minds refresh, those weary us,
And spur our doubled spirit to swifter pace."

(From the most elegant and witty Epigrams of Sir John Harrington, Knight, digested into four bookes, Lon., 1625, sm. 8vo.)

Bastard, William. On the Culture of Pine Apples, Phil. Trans. Abr., 1777.

Baston, Robert, d. about 1315? a native of Yorkshire, was, according to Bale, poet laureate and public orator at Oxford, but this has been disputed. He became a Carmelite monk, and prior of that order in Scarborough. Edward I. carried him with him in his expedition against Scotland, in 1304, that he might be an eye-witness of and celebrate his victory. But, alas for human expectations! Baston was made prisoner, and, as the price of his ransom, obliged to write a panegyric on Robert Bruce! Baston wrote principally in Latin, and it is doubtful if any of his English compositions are now in existence. The rhyme Baston is so called from our author. The panegyric mentioned above will be found in Fordun's Scotti-Chronicon; it was pub. Oxon., 1722. He also wrote, 1. De Strivliniensis obsidione; of the Siege of Stirling, a poem in one book. 2. De Altero Scotorum Bello, in one book. 3. De Scottis Guerris variis, in one book. 4. De variis mundi Statibus, in one book. 5. De Sacerdotum luxuriis, in one book. 6. Contra Artistas, in one book. 7. De Divite et Lazaro. 8. Epistolæ ad diversos, in one book. 9. Sermones Synodales, in one book. 10. A Book of Poems. 11. A volume of tragedies and comedies in English, the existence of which is doubtful. See Bale; Pits; Hollingshed; Leland; Saxii Onomasticon; Warton's History of English Poetry.

Bastwick, John, M.D., 1593-1650? was distinguished for his violent opposition to the jure divino claim for Episcopacy. He was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, after which he took his doctor's degree at Padua. His first work, Elenchus Religionis Papisticæ, in quo probatur neque Episcopatum neque Catholicam, imo neque Romanam esse, was pub. at Leyden, in 1624. In 1635 he pub. in England, Flagellum Pontificis et Episcoporum Latialium. For this publication he was cited before the High Commission Court; by which he was sentenced to a fine of £1,000, prohibited from practising his profession of medicine, his book to be burnt, himself excommunicated, to pay costs of suit, and be imprisoned until he recanted. Whilst imprisoned, he wrote Apologeticus ad Præsules Anglicanos, 1636; and the Letany for the especial Use of our English Prelates, 1637. For this new attack, Laud had an information exhibited against him in the Star Chamber. Wm. Prynn for his Histrio-Mastix, and Rev. Dr. Burton for publishing two seditious sermons, were also brought under discipline. The three defendants, to the disgrace of the court, were sentenced to lose their ears, to pay a fine of £5000 each, and to suffer perpetual imprisonment! This barbarous sentence was executed. When the Parliament obtained the supremacy, the three were brought back to London in great triumph, and an order passed for the repayment of the fine of £5000 to each of them. It is said that they never received the money. Bastwick afterwards wrote several pamphlets against the Independents.

Independency not God's Ordinance, Lon., 1645. Defence of himself against Lilburn, 1645. Utter Routing of the whole Army of all the Independents and Sectaries, with the total overthrow of their Monarchy, 1646. The Church of England the true Church. Poor Bastwick fared better than the Patriarch Job in his hour of trial. The wife of his bosom did not "add affliction to his misery;" but when Bastwick mounted the scaffold, he was immediately followed by his wife, who,

"Like a loving spouse, saluted each ear with a kiss, and then his mouth; whose tender love, boldness, and cheerfulness, so wrought upon the people's affections, that they gave a marvellous great shout for joy to behold it."

The martyr was worthy of such a wife.

"So far," said he, "am I from base fear, or caring for any thing they can do, or cast upon me, that had I as much blood as would swell the Thames, I would shed it every drop in this cause. As I said before [in his noble speech before the Star-Chamber] so I say again, had I as many lives as I have hairs on my head or drops of blood in my veins, I would give them all up for this cause!"

The Letany will be found in the 5th vol. of the Somers Collection of Tracts; and an interesting review of it in The Retrospective Review, vol. x.

Bate, George, M.D., 1608-1668, had the remarkable fortune of being physician to Charles I., Cromwell, and Charles II. He is quite as well known as an historian as a professor of the healing art. He studied at Oxford; successively at New College, Queen's College, and Edmund's Hall. He contributed to de Rachitide, pub. Lon., 1650, 8vo. After his death, Shipton pub. Pharmacopœia Batensis, Lon., 1688. Dr. Wm. Salmon trans. this work into English under the title of Bate's Dispensatory; it was very popular, and ran through many editions. His principal work is an Account of the Rebellion, with a Narrative of the Regal and Parliamentary Privileges, entitled, Elenchus Motuum nuperorum in Anglia simul ac Juris Regis et Parlamentarii brevis narratio, Paris, 1649; Franckfort, 1650, 4to. It was revised by Dr. Peter Heylyn, who "Made several observations on it, greatly tending to the honour of the king and church."

Reprinted with additions to 1660, Lon., 1661, 8vo; with further additions to 1663, 8vo; and with a third part by Dr. Thomas Skinner, in 1676, 8vo. The whole trans. into English by Mr. Lovel, in 1685.

"A work worth reading."—BISHOP WARBURTON.

It was answered by Robt. Pugh. Elenchus Elenchi, sive Animadversiones in Elenchum M. Angliæ, Paris, 1664, 8vo. Pugh was an officer in the king's army.

"To which Bate made a reply, but, as his son had told me, he did not publish it, only put it in MS. in the Cottonian Library; and upon that report I did in my Hist. Antiq. Univ. Oxon. say as much in the life of Dr. Bate. Whereupon Pugh, having had notice of, or else had read it, he made a search after it in the said Library (as he himself hath told me several times) but could not find it, otherwise he would have made a rejoinder."—Wood.

Bate, Rev. Henry. See DUDLEY, SIR H. B.

Bate, James, 1703-1755, elder brother of Julius Bate, was admitted a pensioner of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1720. He took holy orders, and attended the Rt. Hon. Horace Walpole as chaplain, in his embassy to Paris. In the preface to the second edition of his Rationale, &c., 1766, he laments that "it was his hard fate, in his younger years, to serve one of our ambassadors as his chaplain at a foreign court."

His principal works are, Infidelity scourged, or Christianity vindicated against Chubb, &c., 1746, 8vo. An Essay towards a Rationale of the literal doctrine of Original Sin, &c., occasioned by some of Dr. Middleton's writings, 1752, 8vo. He also pub. several sermons, 1734-45.

Bate, John, d. 1429, a learned divine, was the author of a number of works in grammar, logic, and divinity. He studied at Oxford, where he was noted for his knowledge of the Greek tongue. On leaving Oxford, he became president of the house of the Carmelite friars at York. Leland, Bale, and Pits enumerate 14 treatises by this author.

Bate, Julius, b. about 1711, d. about 1771, a divine of the Hutchinsonian school, pub. a number of theological works, principally in defence of his peculiar system of interpretation. We give the titles of some of them. An Essay towards explaining the third chapter of Genesis, and the Spiritual Sense of the Law, in answer to Mr. Warburton, Lon., 1641, 8vo.

"This is a reply to Warburton's third proposition, which he certainly succeeds in overturning; but there is too much refinement of spiritualizing in his exposition."—Ozma.

Critica Hebraica, or a Hebrew English Dictionary, without points, &c., the whole supplying the place of a Commentary on the Words and more difficult Passages in the Sacred Writings, 1767, 4to. In the preface Mr. Bate warmly attacks the "hydra of pointing;" he commends the courage of Capellus, "who ventured to encounter this monster, and vanquished it, together with its renowned advocate, Buxtorf."

Parkhurst quotes this work (and the Essay on the Similitudes) with approbation, but it has never come into general use as a Hebrew Dictionary.

"His work will doubtless be useful according to its plan, and to the principles on which he proceeds. The followers of Mr. Hutchinson's system will not fail to pronounce it a Chef d'œuvre; while the Rationalists will consign it to a peaceful place on the same undusted shelf on which the great Calasio reposes, undisturbed, in the friendly arms of the Rev. Mr. Wm. Romaine."

A New and Literal Translation from the Original Hebrew of The Pentateuch of Moses, and of the Historical Books of the Old and New Testament, to the end of the Second Book of Kings, with Notes, Critical and Explanatory, 1773, 4to. This work was the principal literary occupation of its author for a great part of his life. What he completed of the Old Testament was pub. two years after his death.

"As a translation, it greatly fails in perspicuity, smoothness, and grammatical accuracy. Many of the renderings are really amusing. The Giants of Genesis, vi. 4, are, according to him, 'apostates.' The window of the ark, chapter vi. xvi. was to be 'flushed in an arm above.' At the commencement of the deluge, 'the air cracks were opened,' and at the conclusion of it, the 'air cracks were shut.' The notes are full of the peculiarities of his system, and discover no correct acquaintance with the principles of philology or enlightened criticism."—Ozma.

"Bate, by giving the Hebrew idiom too literally, has rendered his version neither Hebrew nor English."—LOWDES.

"It is most certainly a new translation, and so very literal as to be really unintelligible to a plain English reader."—Monthly Review.

Bateman, Thomas, M.D., 1778-1821, was born at Whitby in Yorkshire. He enjoyed the great advantage of pursuing his medical studies under the eminent Dr. Willan, physician to the public dispensary in Carey street. When Dr. Willan's health obliged him, in 1811, to depart for Madeira, Dr. Bateman succeeded to his extensive practice in diseases of the skin. In 1813 he pub. A Practical Synopsis of Cutaneous Diseases, according to the arrangement of Dr. Willan, exhibiting a Concise View of the Diagnostic Symptoms, and the Method of Treatment, Lon., 8vo, 3d ed., 1814; 8th ed., 1836. This work was trans. into French, German, and Italian. The Emperor of Russia was so much pleased with this work that he sent the author a ring of 100 guineas value. In 1815 the doctor pub. Delineations of Cutaneous Diseases, comprised in the classification of the late Dr. Willan, including the greater part of the Engravings of that Author, in an improved state, and completing the Series, as intended to have been finished by him, Lon., 4to, 1815-17; 12 fasciculi pub. at £1 1s. each; again Lon., 1840.

He pub. a number of theological treatises, 1663-99. These were collected and pub. in a folio vol. in the year after his decease, and again in 1723. His principal works were, The Harmony of the Divine Attributes in the Redemption of Man, 1697.

Spiritual Reflection Unfolded and Enforced, 1699.

"In the Spiritual Reflection there is no leaning to fanaticism on the one hand, or to lukewarmness on the other." Dr. J. Pre Smith, in his introductory essay to an edition of this work, pub. in 1834, "does ample justice both to the history and character of the author. . . This non-conformist divine is charming and elegant as a writer."

Bates was sometimes called the "silver-tongued," and was reckoned the politer writer, if not the best scholar, of the whole body of ministers who retired from the church in 1662, on the passage of the Act of Uniformity, and formed what is sometimes called the "Dissenting Interest." Bickersteth remarks that he has "many happy similes." Vitæ Selectorum aliquot virorum qui Doctrinâ, Dignitate, aut Pietate inclaruere, 1681. A valuable collection of Lives: 32 in number. Discourse about the Four Last Things, viz.: Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell, 1691.

"Perhaps the most elegant of Bates's works. . . The Discourses are admirable specimens of sound and practical theology, conveyed in an elegant and most attractive style. Any one, however, who reads it carefully, will find, that some of his best passages are just the expansion of ideas picked up in the course of an extensive study of the fathers. The same remark, indeed, applies to all his works."

Dr. Derham attributes to him a pamphlet, entitled News from the Dead, pub. 1651; and Carrère gives him credit for the authorship of Prælectiones tres de Respiratione, Oxon., 1654. As a classical scholar Dr. Bathurst was very eminent. His iambs prefixed to Holles's Treatise of Human Nature, pub. 1650, have been greatly admired.

"His Latin Orations are wonderful specimens of wit and antithesis, which were the delight of his age. They want, upon the whole, the purity and simplicity of Tully's eloquence, but even exceed the sententious smartness of Seneca, and the surprising turns of Pliny. . . That pregnant brevity which constitutes the dignity and energy of the Iambic, seems to have been his talent."

—Life by Warburton.

"Although he maintained the most exact discipline in his college, his method of instruction chiefly consisted in turning the faults of the delinquent scholars into ridicule, in which expedient he always effectually succeeded; all the young students admired and loved him."—EARL OF BATHURST, nephew to the Doctor.

Batman, or Bateman, Stephen, d. 1587, a divine and a poet of considerable note, is said to have been a native of Bruton, in Somersetshire. He studied philosophy and divinity at Cambridge, and became chaplain and librarian to Archbishop Parker. In 1569 he pub. 1. The Travayled Pilgrime, bringing News from all Parts of the Worlde, such like scarce hard before, 4to. [Lon., by John Denham.] Black Letter, with 20 wood-cuts. This is an allegorical-theological romance of the life of man, in verse of 14 syllables, introducing historical incidents and characters relative to the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Queens Mary and Elizabeth. Sold at Sotheby's, in 1821, for £29 18s. 6d.; resold, Perry, pt. i. 618, for £26 15s. 6d.

2. A Christall Glasse of Christian Reformation, London, by John Day, 1569, 4to. With many wood cuts. Joyfull Newses out of Helvetia, &c., 1575, 8vo. 3. Golden Booke of the Leaden Goddes, &c., 1577, 4to, dedicated to Lord Henry Cary.

"Shakespeare is supposed to have consulted this book, which may be considered as the first attempt towards a Pantheon, or description of the Heathen Gods."

4. A Preface before John Rogers's Displaying of the Family of Love, 1579, 8vo. 5. Doome warning all Men to Judgement; In manner of a generall Chronicle, 1581, 4to. 6. Of the Arrivall of the 3 Graces in Anglia, lamenting the Abuses of the Present Age, 4to, sine anno. 7. Notes to Leland's Assertio Arthuri, trans. by Richard Robinson, sine anno. 8. Batman vpon Bartholome his Booke De Proprietatibus Rerum, newly corrected, enlarged, and amended, fol., 1582. See BARTHOLOMÆUS ANGLICUS, in this volume. Batman revelled in his patron's library in the true Dominic Sampson spirit: he tells us that he increased its treasures by six thousand seven hundred books in four years; and more than one thousand manuscripts collected by his pains bore witness to his laudable zeal.

"First by conference with Master Steuen Batman, a learned preacher and friendly fauourer of vertue and learning, touching the praise worthe progenie of this K. Arthure, he gave me this assured knowledge on this manner taken out of his ancient records written at Aualonia."—Robinson's trans. of Leland's Arthure.

Batmanston, John, d. 1531, a Roman Catholic divine, studied divinity at Oxford. He wrote against the doctrines of the Reformation. 1. Animadversiones in Annotationes Erasmi in Novum Testamentum. 2. A Treatise against some of M. Luther's writings. 3. Commentaria in Proverbia Salomonis. 4. In Cantica Canticorum. 5. De Unica Magdalenâ, contra Fabrum Stapulensem. 6. Institutiones Noviciorum. 7. De Contemptu Mundi. 8. De Christo duodenni. 9. A Homily on Luke ii. 42. 9. On the words "Miscus est," &c. It is supposed that several of these works were never printed.

"John Batmanston controverted Erasmus's Commentary on the New Testament with a degree of spirit and erudition, which was unhappily misapplied, but would have done honour to the cause of his antagonist in respect to the learning displayed."—WARREN.

Baxter, Alexander. Con. to Phil. Trans. Abr., 1787.

Baxter, Andrew, b. about 1686, d. 1750, was born at Old Aberdeen in Scotland, and educated at the university of this town. His time was usefully employed as private tutor to young gentlemen. Among his pupils were Lord Grey, Lord Blantyre, and Mr. Hay of Drummelzier. With the latter he travelled, and resided from 1741 to 1747 on the continent. He pub. An Enquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul, wherein its immateriality is evinced from the Principles of Reason and Philosophy, Lon. 4to, sine anno; 2d ed., 1737, 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed., 1745, 2 vols. 8vo. In 1750 was pub. an appendix to his Enquiry, in which he answers some objections of Maclaurin's. To this appendix is prefixed a dedication to the well known, or we should rather say widely known, John Wilkes. In 1779 Rev. Dr. Duncan pub. The Evidence of Reason in proof of the Immortality of the Soul, independent on the more abstruse Inquiry into the Nature of Matter and Spirit: collected from the MSS. of Mr. Baxter, Lon., 8vo. He drew up for the use of his pupils and his son, a piece entitled Matho, sive Cosmotheoria puerilis Dialogus, &c., Lon., 1740, 2 vols. 8vo. This work enlarged was pub. in English in 1743; Matho, &c., wherein from the Phenomena of the Material World, briefly explained, the principles of Natural Religion are deduced and demonstrated, Lon. 2 vols. 8vo; 3d ed. 1765. Baxter's treatise on the soul has been highly commended.

"He who would see the justest and precise notions of God, and the soul, may read this book; one of the most finished of the kind, in my humble opinion, that the present times, greatly advanced in true philosophy, have produced."—Br. Warburton.

Baxter builds his reasoning upon the principle of the vis inertiae of matter. Hume objects to his system, without naming him, in his Enquiry concerning Human Understanding. We have seen that Baxter did not live to complete his design.

"I own if it had been the will of Heaven, I would gladly have lived till I had put in order the second part of the Inquiry, showing the immortality of the human soul; but infinite wisdom cannot be mistaken in calling me sooner. Our blindness makes us form wishes."—Letter to John Wilkes.

"Mr. Baxter endeavours to prove that dreams are produced by the agency of some spiritual beings, who either amuse, or employ themselves seriously, in engaging mankind in all those imaginary transactions with which they are employed in dreaming."

"Baxter's Inquiry displays considerable ingenuity, as well as learning. Some of the remarks on Berkeley's argument against the existence of matter are acute and just, and at the time when they were published, had the merit of novelty."—DUGALD STUART.

Baxter, Richard, 1615–1691, a celebrated Nonconformist divine, was a native of Rowton in Hampshire. In 1638 he was ordained by Bishop Thornborough, and two years later was chosen vicar of Kidderminster. On the breaking out of the civil war, he desired to remain neutral; but suspecting the ambitious designs of parliament, he resolved "to repair instantly to the army, and use his utmost endeavours to bring the soldiers back to the principles of loyalty to the king, and submission to the church." When Cromwell was declared protector, he bravely "withstood him to the face," telling him that "the honest people of the land took their ancient monarchy to be a blessing, and not an evil." Whilst chaplain to Colonel Whalley's regiment, he wrote his best-known work, The Saint's Rest. The Act of Uniformity of 1662 drove him from that church of which he had been so useful a member. In the same year he married Margaret, daughter of Francis Charleton, Esq., of Shropshire, a magistrate. In 1682 this excellent man was seized for coming within five miles of a corporate town; again, in 1684, he was subjected to the same ill usage, and indeed for years his life was harassed by these unchristian persecutions. In May, 1684–85, he was tried before Lord-chief-justice Jeffreys upon a charge of sedition, founded upon his Notes on the New Testament. On this occasion, Jeffreys displayed his usual brutality. When Baxter asked for time, this upright judge exclaimed,

"I will not give him a moment's more time to save his life. Yonder stands Oates in the pillory with him. I would say two of the greatest rogues and rascals in the kingdom stood there."

When Baxter endeavoured to speak—

"Richard! Richard!" ejaculated the judge, "dost thou think we'll hear thee poison the court? Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave; thou hast written books enough to load a cart. Hadst thou been whipt out of thy writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy."

Jeffreys would gladly have inflicted the whipping now, through the streets of the city, but the other judge had less brutality; and the sentence was only a fine of 500 marks, imprisonment till paid, and bonds for good behaviour for seven years! But Lord Powis, a nobleman (in-deed) of the Roman Catholic Church, exerted himself successfully to have the fine remitted, and he was liberated after an imprisonment of about eighteen months. The remaining five years of his life were unmolested by his persecutors. He continued preaching until December, 1691, when he died "in great peace and joy."

Among his best known works are: 1. The Saint's Everlasting Rest, Lon., 1650. 2. A Call to the Unconverted, Lon., 1669. 3. Christian Directory, Lon., 1673. 4. The Poor Man's Family Book, Lon., 1674. 5. The Cure of Melancholy, &c., Lon., 1683. 6. A Paraphrase on the New Testament, Lon., 1685. 7. Dying Thoughts, Lon., 1688. 8. Reliquiæ Baxterianæ, or his own Narrative of his Life and Times, pub. by M. Sylvester, Lon., 1696, fol. He is said to have been the author of above 120 books, (Watt enumerates 112,) and to have had more than half that number written against him.

A collection of his Discourses was pub. in 1707, 4 vols. fol. He was a deeply learned and most holy man. Lord William Russell, before his execution, sent to Baxter his hearty thanks for his Dying Thoughts.

"Such have made me better acquainted with the other world than I was before, and have not a little contributed to my support and relief, and to the fitting me for what I am to go through."

20,000 copies of the Call to the Unconverted were sold in a twelvemonth, and it was translated into all the European languages, and into one of the dialects of India. He is said to "Have preached more sermons, engaged in more controversies, and written more books, than any other Nonconformist of the age."

In his efforts for the spiritual welfare of his flock, he was a bright example to all ministers:

"Visiting from house to house, prevailing on them almost universally to practise FAMILY PRAYER, and instrumentally effecting a great reform among them."

Bishop Stillingfleet speaks of him as

"Our revered and learned Mr. Baxter."

"A person of great devotion and piety, and of a very subtle and quick apprehension."—BISHOP BURNET.

Bishop Patrick refers to "his learned and pious endeavours;" and he had the esteem and friendship of many great and worthy men, as Chief Justice Hale, Archbishop Tillotson, the Earl of Lauderdale, &c. Dr. Manton thought he came nearest the apostolical writings of any man of his age. Archbishop Usher importuned him to write on the subject of Conversion. Dr. Barrow declared,

"His practical writings were never mended, his controversial, seldom refuted."

"His books, for their number and variety of matter, make a library. They contain a rich treasure of controversial, casuistical, positive, and practical divinity."—DR. BATES.

"The best method of forming a correct opinion of Baxter's labours for the press, is by comparing them with some of his brethren who wrote a great deal. The works of Bishop Hall amount to 10 vols. 8vo; Lightfoot's extend to 13; Jeremy Taylor's to 15; Dr. Goodwin's would make about 20; Dr. Owen's extend to 28; Baxter's, if printed in a uniform edition, would not be comprised in less than SIXTY VOLUMES!"

"He was the fittest man of the age for a casuist, because he feared no man's displeasure, nor hoped for any man's preferment."—HOW. ROSE. BOTLE.

"Baxter's work on the New Testament, like most of his practical divinity, is plain, forcible, and improving."—GRANLESTONE.

"It is rather of a practical than a critical nature. It is designed not so much for the use of the learned, as of religious families in their daily reading of the Scriptures, and of the poorer sort of scholars, and ministers, who want fuller helps. To such, the work is fitted to be useful; but even others will find occasionally some very important suggestions, and the true meaning of a difficult passage pointed out with no parade of learning."—ORME.

"The annotations at the end of the chapters are, for the most part, very short, and contain much sound sense and piety."—T. H. HORN.

"It is very plain, but with much piety and good sense. Baxter was a truly pious and practical writer, with lively views of eternity."—BUCKLESTON.

The same critic considers our author's Catholic Theology as "well calculated to abate self-conceit. An extensive view of different opinions;" his "Reasons of the Christian Religion is a powerful treatise;" his "Church History of the Government of Bishops, contains much information respecting the errors of Councils, taken from Blandius and Crabbe;" his "Narrative of his Life and Times is a very instructive and entertaining work, respecting one of the most interesting periods of English History. Allowance should be made for the imperfection of every human writer, and for his peculiarities. Bitter animadversions were published on this work in 1696, entitled Vindiciæ Anti-Baxterianæ."

"He must be very wise or very stupid to whom Baxter can impart no instruction."—ORME.

"His books of Practical Divinity have been effectual for more numerous conversions of sinners to God, than any printed in our time; and while the church remains on earth, will be of continual efficacy to recover lost souls."—DR. BATES.

Dr. Calamy says of The Saint's Everlasting Rest,

"This is the book for which multitudes will have cause to bless God for ever. . . . The examples of heavenly meditation which Baxter gives, really breathe of heaven; and the importance of such meditation as a duty, and as a means of spiritual growth, is admirably set forth, and most powerfully enforced."

A celebrated critic remarks of Gildas Salvianus, or Reformed Pastor,

"In the whole compass of divinity, there is scarcely any thing superior to this valuable practical treatise, in close pathetic appeals to the conscience of the minister of Christ upon the primary duties of his office. The main object is to press the necessity of his bringing home the truth of the Gospel to every individual of his flock, by affectionate, cathedraical instruction."

Dr. Samuel Clarke considered our author's Reasons of the Christian Religion as one of the most masterly performances on the subject of any in the English language.

"In it Baxter examines Lord Herbert's book, On Truth, and furnishes some ingenious, judicious, and valuable remarks by way of answer."—BOGUE.

"Baxter's Reasons contain an able statement of the evidences."—BUCKLESTON.

His Key for Catholics to open the Juggling of the Jesuits has been commended as "A masterly refutation of the errors and peculiar dogmas and a thorough exposure of all the deceitful arts of the Romish Church and Jesuitism."

His Church History of Bishops, and Treatise on Episcopacy,

"Are among the best of Baxter's writings which have not been republished, and well deserve the attention of inquirers into the affairs of the Church."—ORME.

"His vouchers are beyond all exception."—WESLEY.

"There is a living energy and spirit in the practical writings of Baxter, which the reader seldom meets with in any other author. His appeals to the conscience are often mighty and irresistible."—WILKINSON'S Christian Preacher.

"Baxter wrote as in the view of eternity; but generally judicious, nervous, spiritual, and evangelical, though often charged with the contrary. He discovers a manly eloquence, and the most evident proofs of an amazing genius, with respect to which he may not improperly be called the English Demosthenes."—DODDRIDGE'S Lect. on Preaching.

"Pray read with great attention Baxter's Life of himself; it is an inestimable work. There is no substitute for it in a course of study for a clergyman or public man; I could almost as soon doubt the Gospel verity as Baxter's veracity."—COLERIDGE.

Dr. Dibdin describes Baxter as "A divine of a most capricious, yet powerful and original, mind. What Prynne was in law and history, Baxter was in theology: as the similarity, in point of quaintness, in the titles of their respective works, testifies."

"Baxter is my particular favourite: it is impossible to tell you how much I am charmed with the devotion, good sense, and pathos, which is everywhere to be found in him."—DODDRIDGE.

"He cultivated every subject he handled, and if he had lived in the primitive time, he had been one of the fathers of the church. It was enough for one age to produce such a person."—BISHOP WILKINS.

"His life contains much useful matter, and many valuable particulars of the time of Charles I."—WILKINSON.

Boswell records the opinion of his great friend:

"I asked him what works of Richard Baxter's I should read. He said 'Read any of them: they are all good.' Another of Johnson's friends tells us that the doctor 'thought Baxter's Reasons of the Christian Religion contained the best collection of the evidences of the divinity of the Christian system.'"

Baxter, William. 1650–1723, born at Llangollen, in Shropshire, was a nephew of the celebrated Richard Baxter. He became a proficient in antiquarian investigations and in the dead languages. In 1679 he pub. a Latin Grammar; and in 1695 an ed. of Anacreon, which was reprinted in 1710 with improvements, which are said to be taken from the ed. of Joshua Barnes, pub. in 1705. In 1701 appeared his celebrated ed. of Horace; the 2d ed. of which was pub. in 1725. Dr. Harwood praises Baxter's ed. as

"By far the best edition of Horace ever published. I have read it many times through, and know its singular worth. England has not produced a more elegant or judicious critic than Baxter."

Gesner's Horace was based upon Baxter's, and Bishop Lowth pronounced the 2d ed. of Gesner's, pub. in 1772, the best ed. of Horace ever delivered to the world. Mr. Baxter was engaged in several other literary labours. In 1719 was pub. a portion of his Glossarium Antiquitatum Britannicarum; the whole of this work was pub. before his death at the expense of that ornament to literature, as well as to the healing art, Dr. Richard Mead. That which relates to the letter A was reprinted in the Reliquiæ Baxterianæ. His etymologies in this work are often correct and undeniable, but some are capricious.

"His conjectures will sometimes appear to be too bold, and too much out of the common road; but more often surprisingly instructive, and always pleasant and diverting to either a British or Irish Antiquary."—Bisshop Nicolson.

Bayly, Thomas, youngest son of Lewis, Bishop of Bangor, was educated at Cambridge. In 1638 he was made sub-dean of Wells. In 1649 he pub. Certamen Religiorum, or a Conference between King Charles I. and Henry, late Marquis of Worcester, concerning Religion, in Ragland Castle, 1646.

The Royal Charter granted unto Kings by God himself, with a Treatise wherein it is proved that Episcopacy is Jure Divino, 1649, 8vo. This work gave offence, and the author was imprisoned in Newgate, where he wrote his Herba Parietis, or the Wall Flower as it grows out of the Stone Chamber belonging to the Metropolitan Prison, fol. 1650.

He escaped to the continent, and became a zealous Roman Catholic, and in 1654 pub. at Douay, the End to Controversy between the Roman Catholic and Protestant Religions, &c. Several other works are ascribed to our author.

Bayly, Thomas Haynes, 1797-1839, was born near Bath, England, where his father was an eminent solicitor. He was intended for the church, and studied for some time at Oxford. After his marriage, in 1826, he resided for some years at a country seat in Sussex. In 1831 he experienced a melancholy reverse in his pecuniary affairs, and for the rest of his life was a sufferer from many mortifications to which poverty subjects those whose habits and tastes have been formed amid affluence and elegance. His literary industry was very great. In a few years he wrote no less than thirty-six pieces for the stage, several Novels and Tales, and his "songs came to be numbered by hundreds." We give the titles of his publications: Aylmers, a novel, 3 vols. post 8vo. Kindness in Women, tales, 3 vols. post 8vo. Parliamentary Letters, and other Poems, 12mo. Rough Sketches of Bath, 12mo. Weeds of Witchery, poems, r. 8vo. To which must be added, Poetical Works and Memoir by his Widow, 2 vols. post 8vo. Mr. Bayly's songs are among the best known and most generally admired in the language. Who is not familiar with the touching pathos of The Soldier's Tear; We met,—'twas in a Crowd; Oh, no, we never mention Her; the joyous abandon of I'd be a Butterfly; or the good-natured satire of My Married Daughter could you see; and Why Don't the Men Propose?

"The poems and songs of Mr. Haynes Bayly will not be entitled to a high place in the literature of our age; a certain air of insubstantiality attaches to them all; the pathos rarely goes down to the springs of the human feelings, and the humour scarcely exceeds the playfulness which marks elegant society in its daily appearance."

"He possessed a playful fancy, a practised ear, a refined taste, and a sentiment which ranged pleasantly from the fanciful to the pathetic, without, however, strictly attaining either the highly imaginative, or the deeply passionate."—MORRIS.

Beaton, Beton, or Bethune, David, 1494–1546, Archbishop of St. Andrew's in Scotland, and Cardinal of the Roman Church, was educated in the University of St. Andrews, and studied divinity at the University of Paris, where he took orders. According to Dempster, he wrote, 1. Memoirs of his own Embassies. 2. A Treatise of Peter's Primacy, and 3. Letters to several persons. Of these last there are said to be some copies preserved in the King's Library at Paris.

"His high station in the Church placed him in the way of great employments; his abilities were equal to the greatest of these; nor did he reckon any of them to be above his merit. . . . Beattie, Aristoteli de Rhetorica, Camb., 1728, 8vo.

Beattie, James, LL.D., &c., 1735–1803, was born at Laurencekirk, in Kincardineshire, Scotland, on the 20th of October. His father was a shopkeeper and farmer, and is said to have been something of a poet, though never distinguished for his productions. In 1749 James was sent to the Marischal College, at Aberdeen, where he remained for four years. He studied divinity with the intention of taking orders, but relinquished this idea. In 1758 he obtained the situation of usher in the grammar-school of Aberdeen, and two years later was honoured by the appointment of Professor of Moral Philosophy and Logic in Marischal College, which post he retained until within a short period of his death. In 1760 he pub. a volume of poems, the most of which had appeared anonymously in the Scot's Magazine. A portion of these were reprinted in 1766, with the addition of a translation of one of Addison's pieces, and some verses on the death of Churchill. These last, and indeed almost all of our author's earlier pieces, were not deemed by him worthy of a place in future editions of his works. In 1765 he pub. a poem entitled The Judgment of Paris. The design was good, but the poetry was not considered equal to the moral. In 1767 he was married to Miss Mary Dun, daughter of the rector of the grammar-school at Aberdeen. Some two years before his marriage he became acquainted with the poet Gray, and a friendship was established which was dissolved only by the death of the latter in 1771. In 1770 he pub. his Essay on Truth, which was intended as an antidote to the skeptical philosophy of Hume: he desired

"To overthrow skepticism, and establish conviction in its place; a conviction not in the least favourable to bigotry or prejudice, far less to a perverting spirit, but such a conviction as produces firmness of mind and stability of principle, in a consistence with moderation, candour, and liberal inquiry."

The success of this work was worthy of its excellent design. In less than four years it went through five editions, and had been translated into several foreign languages. He received encouragement to take orders in the Church of England, but declined the overture. In 1760, Beattie wrote to Dr. Blackwall that he had commenced "a poem in the style and stanza of Spenser," but he had "resolved to write no more poetry with a view to publication, till he saw some dawnings of a poetical taste among the generality of readers." The first book of The Minstrel, thus referred to, made its appearance in 1771, and was most favourably received. He was honoured by the intimacy of Johnson, Goldsmith, Reynolds, and Garrick; and in 1773 received a substantial token of royal favour in the shape of a pension of £200 per annum. Dr. Beattie gives a very interesting account of an interview with which he was honoured by George III. and the queen:

"They both complimented me in the highest terms on my Essay, which they said was a book they always kept by them; and the king said he had one copy of it at Kew, and another in town, and immediately went and took it down from the shelf. 'I never stole a book but once,' said his majesty, 'and that was yours,' speaking to me. 'I stole it from the queen, to give it to Lord Hertford to read.' He had heard that the sale of Hume's Essays had failed since my book was published; and I told him what Mr. Strahan had told me in regard to that matter."

The author intended to add a second part to the Essay on Truth, but it was never completed.

The second book of The Minstrel appeared in 1774, and was received with as much favour as the former. Shortly before this, Dr. Beattie had declined the offer of the Professorship of Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh. In 1776 he pub. by a subscription of nearly 500 names, a new edition of his Essay on Truth, with some other essays in the same volume: On Poetry and Music, On Laughter and Ludicrous Composition, and On the Utility of Classical Learning. In 1777 a new edition of The Minstrel was given to the world. In this edition was comprised a selection of the author's other poetical pieces. A Letter to Dr. Blair on Psalmody was printed, but not published, in 1778. A List of Scotticisms appeared in 1779, and during the next year he contributed to the Mirror some papers. His Evidences of the Christian Religion, 2 vols. 8vo, was pub. 1786.

"Dr. Beattie's Evidences of Christianity is, perhaps, the most popular, as it is certainly the most useful, of his prose writings."—Sir Wm. Forbes.

In 1790 he gave to the world the first volume of his Elements of Moral Science, edited a new edition of Addison's periodical papers, and contributed a paper to the Royal Society of Edinburgh's publications. Three years later appeared the second volume of the Elements of Moral Science. The death of his two sons in 1790 and 1796, and other domestic afflictions, greatly impaired his health, which had been for many years declining, and after much suffering, he died on the 18th of August, 1803. He pub. in 1779 the Miscellanies of his son, James Hay Beattie. He was buried beside his two sons in the churchyard of St. Nicholas, Aberdeen.

Of the character of Dr. Beattie, it is only necessary to say that he was a philanthropist and a Christian of no common order.

An Account of his Life and Writings, with many of his letters, was pub. at Edin., 2 vols. 4to, in 1806, by Sir William Forbes. We find frequent reference to our author in Boswell's Life of Dr. Johnson. Johnson remarks to Boswell:

"You are a great favourite of Dr. Beattie. Of Dr. Beattie I should have thought much, but that his lady puts him out of my head: she is a very lovely woman. . . . We all love Beattie. Mrs. Thrale says, 'If ever she has another husband, she'll have Beattie. . . . Beattie's book [Essay on Truth] is, I believe, every day more liked; at least, I like it more as I look more upon it.'"

With this favourable opinion the author was highly pleased. He writes to Boswell:

"You judge very rightly in supposing that Dr. Johnson's favourable opinion of my book must give me great delight. Indeed, it is impossible for me to say how much I am gratified by it; for there is not a man on earth whose good opinion I would be more ambitious to cultivate."

On another occasion, Johnson contrasted Beattie favourably with Robertson:

"There is more thought in the novelist than in the historian. There is but a shallow stream of thought in history." Boswell: "But surely, sir, an historian has reflection?" Johnson: "Why, yes, sir; and so has a cat when she catches a mouse for her kitten: but she cannot write like [Beattie]; neither can [Robertson]." Such was his sensibility, and so much was he affected by pathetic poetry, that when he was reading Dr. Beattie's Hermit, in my presence, it brought tears into his eyes. . . . The particular passage which excited this strong emotion was, as I have heard from my father, the third stanza, 'Tis Night,' &c.—J. Boswell, Jr. "The Fourth."—MARKLAND.

The Essay on Truth is now but little read. The Edinburgh Reviewer of Sir William Forbes's volumes censures the Essay in no measured terms:

"Every one has not the capacity of writing philosophically; but every one may be at least temperate and candid; and Dr. Beattie's book is still more remarkable for being abusive and acrimonious, than for its defects in argument and originality. There are no subjects, however, in the wide world of human speculation, upon which such vehemence appears more groundless and unaccountable, than the greater part of those which have served Dr. Beattie for topics of declamation or invective."

"Beattie, the most agreeable and amiable writer I ever met with, the only author I have seen whose critical and philosophical researches are diversified and embellished by a poetical imagination, that makes even the driest subject and the leanest a feast for an epicure in books. He is so much at his ease, too, that his own character appears in every page, and, which is very rare, we see not only the writer, but the man; and the man so gentle, so well tempered, so happy in his religion, and so humane in his philosophy, that it is necessary to love him if one has any sense of what is lovely."—Cowper.

The Minstrel was designed to "trace the progress of a poetical genius, born in a rude age, from the first dawning of fancy and reason, till that period at which he may be supposed capable of appearing in the world as a minstrel." "I find you are willing to suppose, that, in Edwin, I have given only a picture of myself as I was in my younger days. I confess the supposition is not groundless."—Beattie to Lady Forbes.

"The beauty of external nature was never more finely worshipped than in the conclusion of the ninth stanza, which Gray truly pronounced to be inspired."—Edin. Encyclopedia.

Bishop Warburton pronounced Dr. Beattie to be "superior to the whole crew of Scotch metaphysicians."

Beaumont, Francis, 1585?-1615-16, and John Fletcher, 1576-1625, united themselves so closely during life, that "in death they have not been divided" by the biographer. Francis Beaumont was descended from the ancient and noble family of the name, whose residence was at Grace-Dieu in Leicestershire. His grand-father, John Beaumont, was Master of the Rolls, and his father, Francis, one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas. He was entered a gentleman-commoner of Broadgates' Hall, (now Pembroke College,) Oxford, Feb. 4, 1596-97. After leaving college he became a member of the Inner Temple; but is not supposed to have become very profoundly versed in the principles of jurisprudence. A translation of the fable of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus from Ovid into English rhyme and much enlarged, printed in 1602, 4to, is ascribed to his pen, though not without question. Of Beaumont's life but very little is known. He married Ursula, a daughter of Henry Isley, of Sundridge, in Kent, by whom he left two daughters. He died before he had attained his 30th year, and was buried near the entrance of St. Benedict's Chapel, Westminster Abbey, near the Earl of Middlesex's monument. Bishop Corbit honoured the departed poet by the following epitaph:

ON MR. FRANCIS BEAUMONT.

"He that hath such acuteness and such wit
As would ask ten good heads to husband it:—
He that can write so well that no man dare
Refuse it for the best,—let him beware!
BEAUMONT is dead! by whose sole death appears
WIT's a disease consumes men in few years!"

His brother, also, Sir John Beaumont, intimates that the mental powers of the poet were overtaken:

"Thou should'st have followed me, but Death, to blame,
Miscounted years, and measured age by flame;
So dearly hast thou bought thy precious lines,
Their praise grew swiftly, so thy life declines."

Of the collection entitled The Works of Beaumont and Fletcher, (fifty-two plays, a Masque, and some Minor Poems,) Beaumont alone wrote The Masque of the Inner Temple and Gray's Inn, and the Minor Poems, it is believed, with the exception of The Honest Man's Fortune, which follows the play with that title: this "challenges Fletcher for its sole author, and remains the single undramatic poem extant of Fletcher's, unless we add a few self-commendatory verses prefixed to The Faithful Shepherdess." The Masque dedicated to Sir Francis Bacon was acted and printed 1612-13; the Poems were printed 1640, 4to; 1653, 1660, 8vo. The most celebrated is the Letter to Ben Jonson.

"Beaumont's poems are all of considerable, some of them of high merit."—Dr. Blume.

His original poems give him very superior claims to a place in our collections. Although we find some of the metaphysical conceits so common in his day, particularly in an elegy on Lady Markham, he is in general more free from them than his contemporaries. His sentiments are elegant and refined, and his versification is unusually harmonious. Where have we more lively imagery, or in greater profusion, than in the sonnet, Like a Ring without a Finger? His amatory poems are sprightly and original, and some of his lyrics rise to the impassioned spirit of Shakespeare and Milton. Sir E. Brydges is of opinion that the third song in the play of Nice Valour afforded the first hint of the Il Penseroso."

John Fletcher was the son of Richard, successively Bishop of Bristol, Worcester, and London. He was educated at Cambridge, probably at Bene't College, and had the reputation of respectable proficiency in the classics. As many of the plots of his plays were taken from the Spanish, French, and Italian, it is a fair inference that he was versed in those languages. It is believed that he was never married. He died of the plague, in London, in 1625, and was buried in St. Saviour's, Southwark. In addition to the pieces written exclusively by Fletcher, and his labours in conjunction with Beaumont, he assisted Ben Jonson and Middleton in The Widow, and is supposed to have been also a literary partner with Shakespeare, Massinger, and some other authors. The Two Noble King-men was formerly very confidently attributed to Fletcher and Shakespeare; though later opinions deprive the latter of any share in the authorship. Still the title-page of the first edition carries the name of both, and the assertion seems to have been unquestioned by those who, living near the time, may be supposed to have been as good judges as the ingenious skeptics of modern times. However, we offer no opinion upon the subject. Langbaine declares that Shakespeare was one of the authors; and the following remarks are worthy of consideration:

"Since the truth of this statement was never questioned until modern times, although many of Shakespeare's friends were living when the play was published; since all the old critics mention Shakespeare as one of the writers of it;—and, more than all, since the internal evidence fully bears out the tradition, we think the genuineness of it can scarcely be questioned. If Shakespeare did not assist Fletcher, who then did? None of the plays which Fletcher alone wrote are composed in the same style, or exhibit the same lofty imagination, and if there were any other dramatist save Shakespeare, who could attain to such a height of excellence, he has certainly handed down none of his compositions to posterity. If Shakespeare did not write part of it, all we can say is, that his imitators went very near to rival himself!"—Cunningham's Bing. Hist. of Eng.

We have stated that after deducting from "The Works of Beaumont and Fletcher" those compositions of which Beaumont was sole author, (and the one undramatic poem of Fletcher's,) we have remaining fifty-two plays. Mr. Darley remarks:

"Out of the fifty-two plays, Beaumont had no share in the first nine here set down, it may be said with little hesitation, and with none, in the next nine—making in all eighteen."

"For this latter set of dates we have Sir Henry Herbert, the licensor's, manuscript, as authority; which also decides the corresponding dramas to be by Fletcher alone, except the Maid of the Mill, wherein he had Rowley's assistance. That the Faithful Shepherdess was Fletcher's sole production, there is no doubt, and every evidence. Two other plays by him, licensed in 1623, are lost.—The Devil of Downgate; or, Usury put to Use, and The Wandering Lovers. For the former set of dates we have authority not so direct, but sufficient; and Fletcher seems to have written without help all the dramas, dated and undated, save the last two, which he left imperfect, and which Malone says were finished by Sherry. These eighteen plays, therefore, furnish criticism a fair, broad ground whereupon to judge of Fletcher's individual style. We may perhaps add The Woman Hater, produced about 1606-7. Concerning the other thirty-three dramas, (half a dozen excepted,) we can ascertain the times of their representation, or, at least, publication, with various degrees of precision; but it is difficult to apportion their authorship—I might say, impossible—though easy enough to hypothesize, and yet easier to pronounce about it. . . . Besides the above-mentioned definite class of Eighteen attributable almost entirely to Fletcher, I shall mark out another of Nine, all of which may have been partly written by Beaumont, as they were composed or made public before his death, and some of them even claim him for their chief author on good evidence."

"I add The Scornful Lady, though not published till after the death of Beaumont, because it was written some years earlier; and I omit the Woman Hater, though published before that epoch, because he is understood to have had no share in this work."

"Even from the above small class we can select but three dramas, verified as joint compositions of our English Damon and Pythias, to wit, Philaster, The Maid's Tragedy, King and No King. The former two, indeed, if they be not equi-valuable with all the other plays together of this collection, are beyond doubt those on which has depended, and ever will depend, its principal charm, and the chief renown of Beaumont and Fletcher. King and No King also renders their genius apparent in its brightest phase. Critics, however, go further than I can. They affirm that of the fifty-two plays, those under-named—sixteen or seventeen (if we include The Knight of the Burning Pestle)—vindicate the time-honoured title of our volume. Beaumont, it is thought, was co-parent to these, but no more than these. I will particularise such of their dates as have been ascertained."

"Partnership in but seventeen out of fifty-two plays gives Beaumont small apparent claim on the total joint-stock reputation. It seems possible, however, that some others, not brought out till after his death, may have been planned, and partly or wholly written, with his co-operation before it."—Introduction to Moxon's edition, Lon., 1839, 2 vols. 8vo.

Beaumont was author, in addition to his works already named, of a drama entitled The History of Mador, King of Great Britain, now lost. Several other compositions have been attributed to our literary partners, as well as to Fletcher, in conjunction with others; in The History of Cardenio, Shakespeare is said to have been his colleague. (See Darley's Introduction, and Weber's edition, Lon., 1802, 8vo, 1814, 14 vols.) This edition was severely handled by Gifford and Oct. Gilchrist.

We have already mentioned the early editions of Beaumont's Poems. The Golden Remains of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher, 2d edit., with other Drolleries by several Wits of these present Times, was pub., Lon., 1660, 8vo. The first collected edition of the comedies and tragedies was pub., Lon., 1647, folio, with portrait of Fletcher. This edition contains a dedication by ten comedians to Philip, the Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery. It was edited by John Shirley, and contained 36 plays, printed for the first time. Also, Lon., 1650, in 4to; 1679, folio; 1711, 7 vols. 8vo; with notes by Theobald, Seward, and Simpson, 1750, 10 vols. 8vo; with notes by various commentators, 1778, 10 vols. 8vo, edit. by George Colman; edit. by Theobald, 1780, 10 vols.; with notes by Henry Weber, 1812, 14 vols. 8vo, with portraits; edited by Dyce, 1843-46, 11 vols. 8vo. Moxon's beautiful edition, 1839, has been before referred to. This enterprising and highly respectable publisher has issued, in the same superior style, the works of Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Dryden, Spenser, Massinger and Ford, Wycherley, Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar. To some of the works of this selection there are such grave objections, that we cannot desire their circulation, and there is hardly one author of the whole to whom the pruning-knife should not be applied before he becomes an inmate in the domestic circle. Our remarks upon certain dramatic writers (see COLLIER, JEREMY) may be consulted in this connexion.

The friendship existing between Beaumont and Fletcher was of the most endearing kind. Aubrey tells us, in his remarks upon Beaumont,

"There was a wonderful consimilitude of phantasy between him and Mr. Jo. Fletcher, which caused that dearneesse of friendship between them. I have heard Dr. Jo. Earle (since Bish. of Sarum) say, who knew them, that his maine businesse was to correct the overflows of Mr. Fletcher's wit. They lived together on the Banke side, not far from the play-house, both bachelors, lay together, . . . the same cloaths and cloake, &c., between them."

We proceed to quote the opinions of a number of writers upon the works of our distinguished poet. Shirley, in the preface to the first collected edition, (1647 see ante), after a laboured description of the constitutents of true poetry, remarks,

"This, you will say, is a vast comprehension, and hath not happened in many years. Be it then remembered to the glory of our own, that all these are demonstrative, and met in Beaumont and Fletcher, whom but to mention is to throw a cloud upon all former names, and benight posterity; this book being, without flattery, the greatest monument of the scene that time and humanity have produced, and must live, not only the crown and sole reputation of our own, but the statu of all other nations and languages."

We quote some specimens from the Commendatory Verses prefixed to the works. The following refer to Fletcher.

"Thou hast left unto the times so great
A legacy, a treasure so complete,
That 'twill be hard, I fear, to prove thy will:
Men will be wrangling, and in doubting still,
How so vast sums of wit were left behind,
And yet nor debts, nor sharers, they can find."
HENRY MOODY, BART.

"Then shall the country, that poor tennis-ball
Of angry fate, receive thy pastoral,
And from it learn those melancholy strains
Fed the afflicted souls of primitive swains.
Thus the whole world to reverence will flock
Thy tragic buskin and thy comic sock:
And winged fame unto posterity
Transmit but only two, this age and thee."
THOMAS PATTON.

"And, by the court of Muses be 't decreed,
What graces spring from poetry's richer seed,
When we name Fletcher, shall be so proclaimed,
As all that's royal is, when Cæsar's named."
ROBERT STAFFILTON, KNT.

"Jonson, Shakespeare, and thyself did sit,
And sway'd in the triumvirate of Wit.
Yet what from Jonson's oil and sweat did flow,
Or what more easy Nature did bestow
On Shakespeare's gentler muse in thee full grown
Their graces both appear."—J. DENHAM.

"Fletcher, to thee, we do not only owe
All these good plays, but those of others too:
Thy wit repeated, does support the stage,
Credite the last, and entertains this age.
No worlde's form'd by any muse, but thine,
Could purchase robes to make themselves so fine."
EDM. WALLER.

"Fair star, ascend! the joy, the life, the light
Of this tempestuous age, this dark world's sight!
Oh from thy crown of glory dart one flame
May strike a sacred reverence, whilst thy name
(Like holy flames to their god of day)
We, bowing, sing; and whilst we praise, we pray."
RICH. LOVELACE.

The bad taste, if not impiety, of this apostrophe is not at all singular in our old writers. We quote the complimentary epistle of Ben Jonson in answer to Beaumont's letter to the former on The Fox:

"To MR. FRANCIS BEAUMONT.
"How I do love thee, Beaumont, and thy Muse.
That unto me doest such religion use!
How I do fear myself, that am not worth
The least indulgent thought thy pen drops forth!
At once thou makest me happy, and unmakest,
And giving largely to me, more thou takest:
What fate is mine that so itself bereaves?
What art is thine, that so thy friend deceives?
When even there, where most thou praisest me
For writing better, I must envy thee!"

We do not discontinue quotations from want of matter, for of the Commendatory Verses inscribed to Fletcher, to Beaumont, and to both together, there are no less than twenty-five sets!

Gerard Langbaine tells us,

"To speak first of Mr. Beaumont, he was master of a good wit, and a better judgment; he so admirably well understood the art of the stage, that even Jonson himself thought it no disparagement to submit his writings to his correction. . . . Mr. Fletcher's wit was equal to Mr. Beaumont's judgment, and was so luxuriant, that, like superfluous branches, it was frequently pruned by his judicious partner. These poets perfectly understood breeding, and, therefore, successfully copy'd the conversation of gentlemen. They knew how to describe the manners of the age; and Fletcher had a peculiar talent in expressing all his thoughts with life and briskness."—Account of Dramat. Poets, 1691.

With reference to Jonson's deference to Beaumont's judgment, we may barely refer to the amusing error of Dryden, who will have it that "Rare Ben" submitted "all of his plots" to the supervision of his sagacious friend; which, Mr. Darley truly remarks,

"Would prove our author indeed a precocious genius, as Every Man in His Humour was produced in 1596, when Beaumont was but ten years old. But Dryden seems to have been the loosest speaker, not an intentional liar, among all our great literati."

Dryden tells us that Beaumont and Fletcher's plays in his time were the most pleasing and frequent entertainments of the stage, two of them being acted through the year for one of Shakespeare's or of Jonson's. Sir John Denham had no hesitation in avowing his preference for Fletcher above Shakespeare:

"None Shakespeare loved, yet had his citizens too,
Often above himself, sometimes below,
Then always best.
Shakespeare was early up, and went to sleep
As for those dancing hours he knew was best;
But when the sun came forth, you see thought fit
To wear just robes, and leave off truss him off."

Mr. Cartwright is of the same mind:

"Shakespeare to them was dull, whom best just then
I'll leave to question, and the Poet's replies:
(His) second wit, which rather than to turn,
In two a man, which our fathers call a the (them);
Whom we our new times would characterize well,
And which made history poets for a while.
Nature was all his art, thy vein was free
As his, but without his severity."

The commendation for decency, as contrasted with Shakespeare, is an exceedingly preposterous, that we cannot but wonder whether Cartwright ever really perused Fletcher's writings. Rymer criticises The Maid's Tragedy, The Chances, and Valentinian, with great severity. He sent one of his reviews to Dryden, who, in the blank leaves before the beginning and after the end of the book, made several remarks, as if he designed an answer to that gentleman. The following is not without interest:

"Shakespeare and Fletcher have written to the genius of the age and nation in which they lived, for though nature as he (Rymer) objects, is the same in all places and times, yet the modes, yet the climate, the age, the disposition of the people to whom a poet writes, may be so different, that what pleased the Greeks would not satisfy an English audience."

We cordially answer in the following manner:

"Among the poets of Beaumont and Fletcher their want of decency calls for particular reprehension. In this respect they are far more blameable than Shakespeare. The language they put into the mouths of the best characters hath sometimes a freedom, we might say a coarseness, in it, which cannot be justified from the manners of the age, though that circumstance has been alleged in justification of their conduct."

It has been well remarked that

"Men writers at least those of great abilities are commonly so jealous of their own productions, that they are very unwilling to see another stage with them in the face of a single thought that has not with success. How great, then, must have been the indignation of our two poets how noble a merit must they have made to mortals in thus branding their reputations, and such commencing to each that light which would have made them doubly immortal."—General Day Day

"Almost every one of Beaumont and Fletcher's fifty-two dramas is founded upon love. This fact might even alone serve for a gauge to test the genius of our authors. Among all poetic subjects, love is the easiest to succeed with, being the most popular to select. It ever offers us, therefore, a march of weakness, a pond of impotence to handle subjects, which without less delicacy, enthusiasm. No dramatist who has a heart will refuse love-subjects; but they will be always chosen by most dramatists who have nothing else. Beaumont and Fletcher seem to have sought one deep truth of nature—their women are either the more singular or dissipated than their men. They have also depicted women much better,—a mark, by the bye, of their feminine genius, if we must not call it coarseness or folly. Certain of their lyrics are very good, especially the Amorous. Good Lyones ever young. In Valentinian breathes a fine spirit of Beaumontian enthusiasm. But the strong sex lyrics touched most often was that which, like the Yemassee here, responded love; and which often did so with exquisite sweetness."

"The very wrong of Cupid's bow sung to it. Indeed, throughout their works. From the Valentinian seems to have been the little word on which they relied, rather than Harmonia the Terminatio, though not always so successfully as Comus."—Daniel Milton, doubtless, was largely indebted to Fletcher's Faithful Shepherdess in his Comus.

"True, those thoughts then transferred, frequently resemble notes in the cuckoo's, themselves shrill, pathetic, gliding with a sadness not their own."

these passions are portrayed not in their rise and gradual progress, but in their highest mood."—Chompsell's Essay Hist. of Eng.

"Fletcher had an excellent wit, which, the best friends to stage-plays will say was neither his nor well employed for he and Francis Beaumont, require, like Corneille and Voltaire, must begin when to conjugation, raised the English to equal the Athenians and Roman theatre Beaumont bringing the highest of judgment, Fletcher the gift of phantasy, both compensating a just to education."—Fletcher's Edition

The justice of this appellation of wit and judgment has been questioned

"Some on the one hand. The Maid's Tragedy Philaster and the King and the King, to which Beaumont is generally allowed to have had the chief hand, exhibit many traces of the qualities by which Fletcher was distinguished than the majority of the other plays which they are known to have written in conjunction. Still, on the other hand, these writers by Fletcher alone, are on the whole, equal to points of taste and judgment to most of those in which Beaumont's assisted him."

"It cannot be denied that they are lyrical and descriptive poets of the highest order, every page of their writings is a hardy; they are dramatic poets of the second class in point of knowledge, variety, strength and effect, there is hardly a passion, character, or situation, which they have not touched in their dramatic range, and whatever they touched they adorned with more grace or striking features. They are masters of style and versification in almost every variety of metrical modulation or sounding pomp of which they are capable in verse wit and spirit, they are severely compared by any writers of our age."—Harvey Age of Elizabeth

"Their choice in variety and variety, their delicate, a maximum and growing sense that beauty is in conversation. There is in each more hardiness than discretion in the arrangement of their scenes, that, if Beaumont's taste and judgment had the disposal of them he fully proved himself the judicious partner. But it is not probable that their departments were so divided. Still however the equity rights that enable us to guess at what they respectively wrote seem to warrant that distinction to the end of their genius which is made in the past a situation to

Chompsell's Essay on English Poetry

"That Fletcher was not entirely excluded from a share in the conduct of the drama, may be gathered from a story related by Whistler, that our two poets having concerted the rough draught of a tragedy over a bottle of wine at a tavern, Fletcher said to would undertake to fill the king, which words being caught by the waiter who had not overheard the content of their conversation, he lodged an information of treason against them. But on their explanation that it only meant the comparing the death of a theatrical monarch, and their loyalty moreover being ascertained, the affair ended in a jest."

We should not omit to quote the opinion of that very competent critic, Sir Walter Scott:

"Beaumont and Fletcher were still a high practical value. If character is sometimes richness, probably diminished and the interest of the plot suggested, the reader is, on the other hand, often gratified by the most beautiful descriptions, the most tender and passionate dialogues, a display of brilliant wit and gaiety or a hint of simple humour. These attributes had so much effect on the public, that during the end of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th centuries, many of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays had possession of the stage, while those of Shakespeare were laid upon the shelf."—Artists' Drama Esq. Hist.

We refer the reader to Schlegel's review of our authors; a short extract must suffice here

"Beaumont and Fletcher were in fact men of the most delicate painted talents, they scarcely wanted any thing more than a powerful combination of mind, and that artistic sagacity which every where characterizes the measures, to rank beside the greatest dramatic poets of all nations. They possessed extraordinary breadth and flexibility of mind, and a facility which, however too often degenerated into carelessness. The highest purification they have hardly ever attained, and I should have little hesitation in asserting that they had not even as high of it, however on several occasions they have approached quite close to it. And why was it denied them to take this last step? Because with their poetry was not an inward devotion of the feeling and imagination, but a means to obtain brilliant effects. Their first object was effect, which the great artist can hardly do of attaining if he is determined above all things to satisfy himself."—Dramatic Literature

The student will do well to consult, also, the classic pages of Mr. Hallam

"The ornaments and style of Fletcher, when not ennobled by character or corruption of the taste, are very dramatic. We cannot deny that the drama of Shakespeare's mind was often unobtainable by an audience, the love was driven by a mysterious hand, but the chief merit of which. All might have in Fletcher's plan, though not produced or explained, language, his descriptions vivid, though sometimes too broad, in presenting the bloom of English without much probability, though to many persons he seemed to have no common sense, his versification, though at intervals frequent, is often rhetorical and cold. Yet we are seldom arrested by anything beneath the good lines come to every page. See now but surely we lay down the volume with a sense of admiration of what we have read, but little of it remains distinctly in the memory. Fletcher is not much quoted, and has not even afforded copious materials to those who call the beauties of various lines. In variety of character there can be no comparison between Fletcher and Shakespeare."—Literary History of Europe

Another eminent critic is of opinion that Fletcher modelled his plays upon Shakespeare's comedies

"It was then, with their limited wealth of character their poverty of imagery, their mixture of the grave with the playful in thought, their rapid and skillful transitions from the tragic to the comic in feeling; it was these, the pictures in which Shakspeare had made his nearest approach to portraying actual life, and not those pieces in which he transports the imagination into his own vast and awful world of tragic action, and suffering, and emotion—that attracted Fletcher's fancy, and proved congenial to his cast of feeling."—T. B. MACAULAY.

"Whatever may be their just place as dramatists, Beaumont and Fletcher were better poets than any of their dramatic contemporaries, except Shakspeare himself. They mounted higher on the wings of ideal contemplation. None can be compared to them for exuberance and grace of fancy, none for their delicacy and tenderness of feeling in passages of emotion."

How much is it to be lamented that poets of such rare endowments should have debased the muse to the shocking licentiousness which disfigures passages otherwise of marvellous beauty! Professor Shaw justly remarks:

"Nor is it much palliation to consider this licentiousness of speech as the vice of the times. It is true that the charge of indecency may be safely maintained against nearly all the writers of this wonderful period, and we know that the stage has a peculiar tendency to fall into this error; but Shakspeare has shown us that it is very possible to avoid this species of purulence, and to portray the female character not in its warmth only and its tenderness, but also in its purity. The most singular thing is, that many of the more indelicate scenes and much of the coarsest language in Beaumont and Fletcher will be found to have been composed with the express purpose of exhibiting the virtue and purity of their heroines."—Outlines of Eng. Literature.

"There may be quoted from them many short passages, and some entire scenes, as delightful as any thing in the range of poetry; sometimes pleading by their rich imagery, sometimes by their profound pathos, and not unfrequently, by their elevation and purity of thought and feeling. But there are very few of the plays whose stories can be wholly told without offence; and there is none that should be read entirely by a young person."—Spalding's Hist.

This unhappy mingling of nobility of style and elevation of sentiment with vulgarity of incident and obscenity of language—this unsightly admixture of the "fine gold of the head" with the "clay of the feet," to borrow a simile from the inspired vision of the prophet of the Captivity, will ever be regretted by all who desire that literature should be the hand-maid of morality, and intellectual refinement the coadjutor of religious truth.

We close our sketch of these great dramatists with the beautiful comparison of Mr. Campbell:

"There are such extremes of grossness and magnificence in their dramas, so much sweetness and beauty interspersed with views of nature either falsely romantic or vulgar beyond reality; there is so much to animate and amuse us, and yet so much that we would willingly overlook, that I cannot help comparing the contrasted impressions which they make to those which we receive from visiting some great and ancient city, picturesquely but irregularly built, glittering with spires, and surrounded by gardens, but exhibiting in many quarters the lanes and haunts of wretchedness. They have scenes of wealth and high life, which remind us of courts and palaces frequented by elegant females and high-spirited gallants, whilst their old martial characters, with Caractacus in the midst of them, may inspire us with the same sort of regard which we pay to the rough-hewn magnificence of an ancient fortress."

Beaumont, Sir John, 1582-1628, was the second son of Judge Francis Beaumont, and an elder brother of Francis, the celebrated dramatic poet. He was entered a gentleman commoner of Broadgates' Hall, (now Pembroke College,) Oxford, in 1596. After some attention to the study of the law, he retired to the family seat at Grace-Dieu, Leicestershire.

Anth. Wood ascribes to him The Crown of Thorns, a poem in 8 books, never printed. His son gave his father's writings to the world, under the title of Bosworth Field, with a Taste of the Variety of Other Poems, 1629. Pages 181-2 are missing in all copies.

"The chaste complexion of the whole shows that to genius he added virtue and delicacy."

"Bosworth Field certainly contains many original specimens of the heroic style, not exceeded by any of his contemporaries, and the imagery is frequently just and striking. The lines describing the death of the tyrant may be submitted with confidence to the admirers of Shakspeare. Among his lesser poems, a few sparklings of invention may now and then be discovered, and his translations are, in general, spirited and correct."

"The commendation of improving the rhythm of the couplet is due also to Sir John Beaumont, author of a short poem on the battle of Bosworth Field. It was not written, however, so early as the Britannia's Pastorals of Browne. In other respects it has no pretensions to a high rank."—Hallam's Literary History.

"Bosworth Field may be compared with Addison's Campaign, without a high compliment to either. Sir John has no fancy, but there is force and dignity in some of his passages."—CAMPBELL.

"His poems are written with much spirit, elegance, and harmony."—WORDSWORTH.

"Thy care for that, which was not worth thy breath,
Brought on too soon thy much-lamented death.
But Heaven was kind, and would not let thee see
The plague that must upon this nation be,
By whom the Muses have neglected been,
Which shall add weight and measure to their sin."

Beaumont, John, Jr., among other works, 1693-1724, wrote a work to prove the existence of witches and apparitions; Treatise of Spirits, &c., Lon., 1705, 8vo.

Beaumont, Joseph, D.D., 1615-1699, a descendant of the ancient family of the name in Leicestershire, was entered at Peterhouse, Cambridge, at the age of 16. He was elected Fellow and tutor, but was ejected in 1643. In 1663 he became master of his college. He attacked Dr. Henry More's work, The Mystery of Godliness, pub. in 1665, and for his zeal received the thanks of the university, which elected him Professor of Divinity. His Poems in English and Latin were pub. in 1749, 4to, with an Appendix containing comments on the Epistle to the Colossians.

"His Latin Poems, although perhaps superior in style, are yet below the purity of the Augustan age."

His principal work was Psyche, or Love's Mystery, in 24 cantos, displaying the intercourse between Christ and the Soul. This was begun in April, 1647, finished before the end of March, 1648, and pub. in the same year, folio. This poem was once very popular, but has been long neglected. Pope is reported to have said of it,

"There are in it a great many flowers well worth gathering, and a man who has the art of stealing wisely will find his account in reading it."

"The number of lines it contains is 38,922, being considerably longer than the Faerie Queene, nearly four times the length of Paradise Lost, or Henry More's Poem, five or six times as long as the Excursion, and reducing the versified novels of modern times to utter insignificance." Becket, St. Thomas a, Archbishop of Canterbury, b. 1117 or 1119, d. 1170, was the son of Gilbert, a Crusader, afterwards a merchant of London, and Matilda, a Saracen damsel, who is said to have fallen in love with him when he was a prisoner to her father in Jerusalem. He was born in London, cruelly murdered, and buried at Canterbury. The life of this eminent prelate belongs to political, rather than to literary, history. His literary remains consist only of a volume of letters, 435 in number, which passed between distinguished men in Europe relative to the affairs of the English church. To this volume, printed 1495, and at Brussels in 1682, is prefixed the Quadrupartite Life, or De Vita et processu S. Thomæ Cantuariensis et Martyris super Libertate Ecclesiastica. This Life is collected out of four historians, who were contemporary and conversant with Becket, viz., Herbert de Hosham, Johannes Carnotensis, Gulielmus Cantuariensis, and Alanus Teukesburiensis, who are introduced as so many relaters of facts interchangeably. The only writing attributed to Becket besides his epistles, is a Latin hymn to the Virgin, commencing with the words Gaude flore virginali, which is in MS. Some letters of his, besides those published, exist among the Cottonian MS.

"The Latinity of the Archbishop's letters is plain, flowing, and periphrastic,—that of a man who both spoke and wrote the language freely; and they display a warmth of feeling, genuine piety, and highness of principle, for which those whose ideas of Becket have been formed from popular historians will not give him credit."

Beckford, Peter, was a relative of the celebrated William Beckford. He was an enthusiast on the subject of hunting, and gave his experience to the world in his Thoughts on Hunting, in a series of Letters, 1781, 4to. Essays on Hunting; containing a philosophical Inquiry into the Nature and Properties of Scent: on different Kinds of Hounds, Hares, &c., with an Introduction, describing the Method of Hare-hunting among the Greeks, Lon., 1781, 8vo.

"Never had fox or hare the honour of being chased to death by so accomplished a hunter, from the time of Nimrod to the present day; never was a huntman's dinner graced with such urbanity and wit; and never did the red wine of Oporto confuse the intellect of so politic a sportsman. He would bag a fox in Greek, find a hare in Latin, inspect his kennels in Italian, and direct the economy of the stable in exquisite French." "Mr. Beckford and his associate have presumed that there is still room for another history of that nation. The work which their joint labours have produced is, however, by no means either a complete or a uniform history."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Beckford, William, 1760-1844, was the son of the well-known Alderman Beckford, Lord-mayor of London, celebrated for having bearded King George III. on his throne, on the occasion of presenting a petition and remonstrance to his majesty. His son succeeded at the age of 10 years to a fortune of upwards of £100,000 per annum, consisting in part of the estate at Fonthill, and a large property in the West Indies. Young Beckford had the advantage of the watchful care of his sponsor, his father's friend, the great Earl of Chatham. The proprietor of Fonthill determined to erect a splendid superstructure which should embody his conceptions of architectural beauty. In this design and other fancies he expended in sixteen years the enormous sum of £273,000. One tower employed 460 men both by day and by night through an entire winter, the torches used by "the nocturnal workmen being visible to the astonished travellers at miles distant." Fragility was a necessary consequence of such "untimpered" haste; and a gale of wind brought the lofty pile to the ground. Mr. Beckford regretted that he had not been present when so grand a ruin occurred; and he ordered the erection of another tower of 276 feet: this also fell in 1825. Beckford purchased an estate at Cintra, that "glorious Eden of the South;" here he built himself a palace for a residence. Lord Byron alludes to this fairy-palace and its lord in Childe Harold, canto i.

Had the philanthropic spirit of Howard, rather than the ignoble idolatry of self, animated the bosom of "England's wealthiest son," he had not been "lone" in heart amid his regal splendour. The happiness then diffused by him would have irradiated his own path, and thousands would have arisen to call him blessed. It is vain for that man to expect peace upon earth who perverts the design of his creation by "living to himself!"

Mr. Beckford possessed a very valuable collection of pictures, books, and curiosities; his knowledge of the fine arts and general accomplishments were of the highest order. In 1822 Fonthill was thrown open to strangers, preparatory to a sale. 7,200 catalogues were disposed of at a guinea each. It was, however, sold by private contract (some books, pictures, &c., reserved from the collection) to John Farquhar, Esq., for £330,000. In the following year the collection was sold by Mr. Philips, occupying 37 days. See works on Fonthill by Britton, Rutter, Storer, &c.; Historical Notices of Fonthill Abbey, Wiltshire, by Mr. Nichols, 4to, 1836; Gent. Mag. 1844.

In 1783 Mr. Beckford married Lady Margaret Gordon, daughter of the Earl of Aboyne, who died in 1786, leaving issue two daughters, one of whom married Lieutenant-General (then Colonel) James Orde; and the other married Alexander, Duke of Hamilton, Brandon, and Chateherault. Mr. Beckford was lineally descended from the blood royal of Scotland, and an "extraordinary accumulation of descendants from royal and illustrious houses" concentrated in his person.

We may now consider Mr. Beckford as an author, and here, in his own line, he is entitled to as high a position as he might have justly claimed as a virtuoso. At the age of 19 he pub. Biographical Memoirs of Extraordinary Painters, Lon., sm. 8vo, 1780, a work satirizing some English artists under feigned names.

"This volume is an object of curiosity, as it exhibits the germs of some of the finest passages in the subsequent work of the writer, — Vathek. The description of the imaginary hall in the ark of Noah, in the tale of Andrew Guelph, and Og of Basan, possesses much of the wild sublimity and mysterious interest which characterizes the account of the hall of Eblis; and the touches of playful satire which frequently occur to relieve the sombre character of the narrative, in some parts of Vathek, are not less visible in these Memoirs. We conceive that few persons can read these fictitious biographies, without wishing that the author had often favoured the world with his lucubrations. Industry alone seems to have been wanting to have raised him to a level with the greatest novelists of the age."

"They are a series of sharp and brilliant satires on the Dutch and Flemish schools; the language polished and pointed; the sarcasm at once deep and delicate; a performance in which buoyancy of juvenile spirit sets off the results of already extensive observation, and the judgments of a refined (though far too fastidious and exclusive) taste."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

The celebrated romance of Vathek was published in French at Lausanne in 1787. The English edition, issued in 1786, was a translation not made by the author, nor by his consent. Several editions in English have been published. So admirable was the French original for "style and idiom, that it was considered by many as the work of a Frenchman."

Lord Byron, a very competent judge both of the subject and the way in which it should be treated, praises Vathek in the highest terms:

"For correctness of costume, beauty of description, and power of imagination, this most Eastern and sublime tale surpasses all European imitations; and bears such marks of originality that those who have visited the East will have some difficulty in believing it to be more than a translation. . . . As an Eastern tale even Raselas must bow before it: his Happy Valley will not bear a comparison with the Hall of Eblis."

A high authority thus comments upon the noble critic and his subject:

"Vathek is, indeed, without reference to the time of life when the author penned it, a very remarkable performance; but, like most of the works of the great poet who has thus eloquently praised it, it is stained with some poison-spots: its inspiration is too often such as might have been inhaled in the Hall of Eblis. We do not allude so much to its audacious licentiousness, as to the diabolical levity of its contempt for mankind. The boy-author appears already to have rubbed all the bloom off his heart; and, in the midst of his dazzling genius, one trembles to think that a strippling of years so tender should have attained the cool cynicism of a Credide."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

"Vathek, the finest of Oriental romances, as Lalla Rookh is the finest of Oriental poems."—North's Memoir of Beckford.

In 1834, after lying unpublished (though printed) for near half a century, appeared Italy, with sketches of Spain and Portugal, in a Series of Letters written during a Residence in those Countries, Lon., 2 vols. 8vo.

"Mr. Beckford has at length been induced to publish his letters, in order to vindicate his own original claim to certain thoughts, images, and expressions, which had been adopted by other authors whom he had from time to time received beneath his roof and indulged with a perusal of his secret lucubrations. . . . His book is entirely unlike any book of Travels in prose that exists in any European language; and if we could fancy Lord Byron to have written the Harold in the measure of Don Juan, and to have availed himself of the facilities which the ottava rima affords for intermingling high poetry with merriment of all sorts, and especially with sarcastic sketches of living manners, we believe the result would have been a work more nearly akin to that now before us than any other in the library. He is a poet, and a great one, too, though we know not that he ever wrote a line of verse. His raptures amidst the sublime scenery of mountains and forests, in the Tyrol, especially, and in Spain, is that of a spirit cast originally in one of Nature's finest moulds; and he fixes it in language which can scarcely be praised beyond its deserts—simple, massive, nervous, apparently little laboured, yet revealing, in its effect, the perfection of art. Some immortal passages in Gray's letters, and Byron's diaries, are the only things, in our tongue, that seem to us to come near the profound melancholy, blended with a picturesque description at once true and startling, of many of these extraordinary pages. Nor is his sense for the highest beauties of art less exquisite. He seems to us to describe classical architecture, and the pictures of the great Italian schools, with a most passionate feeling of the grand, and with an inimitable grace of expression. On the other hand, he betrays, in a thousand places, a settled voluptuousness of temperament, and a capricious recklessness of self-indulgence, which will lead the world to identify him henceforth with his Vathek as inextricably as it has long since connected Harold with the poet that drew him. . . . We risk nothing in predicting that Mr. Beckford's Travels will henceforth be classed among the most elegant productions of modern literature: they will be forthwith translated into every language on the Continent—and will keep his name alive, centuries after all the brass and marble he ever piled together have ceased to vibrate with the echoes of Modenhas."—Lon. Quarterly Review, li. 426.

Another authority of great reputation, which has guillotined as many unhappy authors in a lustre or two past as did the Edinburgh Review in the first twenty years of its "destructive ravages," thus commends the book under our notice:

"A work rich in scenes of beauty and of life. It is a prose poem. The writer was a young enthusiast, with a passionate love of the ideal and the spiritual, whether in art or nature: travelling had little to do with the work but to call forth feeling; in proof, it was written fifty years ago, yet, though the road has since been travelled by others to utter weariness, it is as fresh and delightful as if the ink were not dry with which it was written. There are scenes in these volumes not to be excelled in modern poetry; pictures where words are as rich in colour and in beauty as the pencil of Turner: the rest is but the connecting link which holds them together. We are not sure that all will agree in this judgment; but the work will assuredly 'fit audience find,' and take a permanent rank in our libraries. . . . In the account of Portugal there is everywhere the same vivid picturing, the same rich colouring, the same passion and power; but instead of scenes from inanimate nature, we have them from life. . . . Our extracts, with the exception of those relating to Venice, have been taken almost at random, so rich is the work in scenes of beauty and of life."—London Athenæum, 1834.

Mr. Beckford has connected his name still more closely with Portugal, by his Recollections of an Excursion to the Monasteries of Alcobaca and Batalha, published in 1835. The excursion was made in June, 1794, at the desire of the Prince Regent of Portugal.

"The monastery Alcobaca was the grandest ecclesiastical edifice in that country, with paintings, antique tombs, and fountains; the noblest architecture, in the finest situation, and inhabited by monks who lived like princes. The whole of these sketches are interesting, and present a gorgeous picture of ecclesiastical pomp and wealth."—Lon. Gent. Mag.

The travellers were "conducted to the kitchen by the abbot, in his costume of High Almoner of Portugal, that they might see what preparations had been made to regale them."

"Through the centre of the immense and nobly-groined hall, not less than sixty feet in diameter, ran a brisk rivulet of the clearest water, containing every sort and size of the finest river fish. On one side, loads of game and venison were heaped up. On the other, vegetables and fruits, in endless variety. Beyond a long line of stoves, extended a row of ovens, and close to them, hillocks of wheaten flour whiter than snow, rocks of sugar, jars of the purest oil, and pastry in vast abundance, such a numerous tribe of lay brothers and their attendants were rolling out, and puffing up into a hundred different shapes, singing all the while as blithely as larks in a corn field."

This magnificent monastery was plundered and given to the flames by the French troops under Massena, in 1811:—One of the many sacrifices to the boundless ambition of one of the smallest and greatest men who has ever disgraced the annals of humanity—Napoleon Bonaparte! Small in his narrow-minded selfishness, great in an intellect perverted to the worst purposes, and ever memorable as one of the most remorseless and unscrupulous wretches who ever trod the earth for the punishment of the nations.

We have only room for one opinion upon the Recollections:

"Pleasing and picturesque as the clime and places visited, this is just a book for the indulgence of the dolce far niente; and our readers can hardly take a more grateful literary companion with them to the couch or grove. Again we have to express the pleasure which this volume has afforded us, and recommend it to the avour it so richly merits; for, though of slight texture, it is a very charming production."—London Literary Gazette.

Beckingham, Charles, 1699–1730–1, a native of London, wrote Scipio Africanus, Henry IV. of France, (both tragedies,) and some other pieces. He also trans. from the Latin of Rapin, Christ's Sufferings, a Poem. His tragedies were represented on the stage before he had completed his twentieth year; they were "Not such as required the least indulgence or allowance on account of his years, but such as bore evidence to a boldness of sentiment, an accuracy of diction, an ingenuity of conduct, and a maturity of judgment, which would have done honour to a much more ripened age."—Biog. Dramat.

Beckington, Bekynton, or De Bekinton, Thomas, d. 1464–65, tutor to Henry VI., Secretary of State, Keeper of the Privy Seal, and Bishop of Bath and Wells, was born in the parish of Beckington, in Somersetshire. He wrote a book on the Right of the Kings of England to the Crown of France, which with some of his Tracts is in MS. in the Cottonian Library. Some of his letters are preserved in the library at Lambeth.

In 1828 that eminent antiquary, Sir Nicholas Harris Nicolas, pub. the Bishop's Journal during his Embassy to negotiate a Marriage between Henry VI. and a daughter of the Count Armagnac, in 1442, 8vo.

"This Journal throws considerable light on an event of importance in the history both of this country and of France, and affords much interesting information on an occurrence which has hitherto been very briefly noticed. There are several letters of Henry VI., with copies of all letters sent and received by the ambassadors connected with their mission."

Beckwith, Josiah, b. 1734, an intelligent antiquary and genealogist, pub. an improved edition of Blount's Fragmenta Antiquitatis, or Ancient Tenures of Land and Jocular Customs of some Manors, Lon., 1784.

"Few persons were better qualified for this business; and Mr. Beckwith has enriched this edition with many valuable additions and improvements. . . . He has subjoined many notes and observations, which have been communicated by some of the most respectable antiquaries of the present day."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Beckwith, Thomas, 1731–1799, brother to the above, and also an enthusiast in antiquarian and genealogical researches, compiled A Walk in and about the city of York, on the plan of Gostling's Walk in and about the city of Canterbury. Mr. B. never pub. any thing, but made extensive collections of valuable papers on his favourite subjects, which are now in the Bodleian Library, the library of the College of Arms, and other depositories.

Becon, or Beacon, Thomas, b. about 1510, d. 1570, a zealous Reformer, was a native of Kent. In 1560 he was presented to the rectory of Buckland in Hertfordshire, and three years later to a church in London. He had a prebendal stall at Canterbury. He wrote many works, principally short tracts in defence of the doctrines of the Reformation. His Workes diligently perused, corrected and amended, were pub. in a folio vol. in 1563–64, by John Day. Only a portion of his works is included in this volume. His publications bear dates 1541–77. Many appeared under the assumed name of Theodore Basil. For a list of his many productions, see Watt's Bib. Brit. The Parker Society pub. Camb., 1843, his Early Works; being the treatises published by him in the reign of King Henry VIII.; in 1844 his Prayers and other pieces; both of these books were edited by the Rev. Beda, or Bede, 672–735. No name is more illustrious in the history of literature and science during the Middle Ages than that of the "venerable" Bede; and we may add that in proportion to his celebrity there are not many writers of whose personal history we possess so few details. His studious and contemplative life probably offered few remarkable incidents to arrest the pen of the biographer or historian; and to his contemporaries, as well as to after ages, (with the exception perhaps of the monastic congregation in which he resided,) he lived chiefly by his works. The only accurate information relating to Bede's life (with the exception of Cuthbert's account of his last moments) is given by Bede himself, at the end of his Ecclesiastical History. All the other biographies, which are of little or no importance, are founded upon what he there states. Smith has inserted in his edition of Bede's historical works, an anonymous life written apparently in the 11th century. Mabillon has given another life, written after the beginning of the 12th century, and other anonymous lives are inserted in the Acta Sanctorum and in Capgrave. Notices more or less detailed are found in Simeon of Durham, William of Malmesbury, and other historians. Baronius and Mabillon have collected together most of the materials relating to the life of this great Anglo-Saxon writer. More recently, memoirs have been published by Mr. Stevenson, in his edition of the Ecclesiastical History, and by Henry Gehler, in a separate work, entitled Disputatio Historico-Theologica de Bedæ Venerabilis, Presbyteri Anglo-Saxonis, Vita et Scriptis, 8vo, Lug. Bat., 1838.

The name in Anglo-Saxon was Beda; as in all words of this form, and names that have continued through many ages to be in people's mouths, the Anglo-Saxon termination a became softened into the later English dumb e. The form Bede has been continued, because it is not incorrect, and because it is the most popular.

Bede was born in 672 or 673, near the place where Benedict Biscop soon afterwards founded the religious house of Wearmouth, perhaps in the parish which is now called Monkton, and which appears to have been one of the earliest endowments of the monastery. As soon as he had reached his seventh year, Bede was sent to Wearmouth to profit by the teaching of Biscop, from which period to his death he continued to be an inmate of that monastery. After the death of Benedict Biscop, Bede pursued his studies under his successor Ceolfrid, and at the age of nineteen, about A.D. 692, was admitted to deacon's orders by John of Beverley, then newly restored to his see of Hexham; and in his thirtieth year (702 or 703) he was ordained to the priesthood by the same prelate. The early age at which Bede received holy orders shows that he was then already distinguishing himself by his learning and piety; and there can be little doubt that his fame was widely spread before the commencement of the 8th century. At that period, according to the account which has been generally received, Bede was invited to Rome by Pope Sergius I., to advise with that pontiff on some difficult points of church discipline. The authority for this circumstance is a letter of the pope to Ceolfrid, expressing his wish to see Bede at Rome, which has been inserted by William of Malmesbury in his History of England. It seems, however, nearly certain that Bede did not go to Rome on this occasion; and reasons have been stated for supposing the whole story, as far as Bede was concerned in it, to be a misrepresentation.

The remainder of Bede's life appears to have passed away in the tranquillity of study and in pious exercises. He never separated himself from the monastery in which he had been educated, but composed within its walls the numerous books which have thrown so much lustre on his name. The larger portion of these works was probably written during the fifteen years preceding 731. His smaller treatise De Temporibus is supposed to have been composed about 701 or 702, and the book De Natura Rerum perhaps about the same time. Bede had finished the three books of his Commentary on Samuel just before the death of Ceolfrid, i. e. in 716. The treatise De Temporum Ratione was composed in 726; the lives of the first Abbots of Wearmouth and Yarrow were published about 716, or soon after; and in 731 was completed his most important work, the Ecclesiastical History of the Anglo-Saxons.

A narrative of Bede's last hours was written by his disciple Cuthbert, and is still preserved. From this account it appears that the last works on which he employed his pen were a translation of the Gospel of St. John into Anglo-Saxon, and a collection of extracts from one of the works of Isidore. At the commencement of the month of April, 735, he was seized with a shortness of breathing, under which he languished till the 26th of May, suffering little pain, but pining away under the effects of his disease and the absence of sleep. During this time he occupied himself day and night either in admonishing his disciples, or in prayer, or in repeating passages from the Scriptures and the fathers of the church, interspersing his observations from time to time with pieces of religious poetry in his native tongue. On the 26th of May, the symptoms became more alarming, and it was evident that death was near at hand. During that day, he continued to dictate (probably the translation of the Gospel of St. John) to one of the younger members of the community, who acted as his scribe; and he resumed the same work early the next morning, which was the Feast of the Ascension, or Holy Thursday, and he told his disciples to write diligently. This they did till nine o'clock, when they retired to perform some of the religious duties peculiar to that day. One of them then said to him, "Dearest master, one chapter still remains, and thou canst ill bear questioning." But Bede desired him to proceed, telling him to "take his pen and write hastily." At the hour of none, (twelve o'clock,) Bede directed Cuthbert to fetch from his closet his spices and other precious articles, which he shared among the presbyters of the house, and begged that they would say masses and prayers for him after his death. He passed the remainder of the day in prayer and conversation, amid the tears of his companions, till evening, when his scribe again interrupted him, telling him that only one sentence of his work remained unfinished. Bede told him to write, and he dictated a few words, when the youth exclaimed, "It is now done!" "Thou hast said right," answered Bede, "it is done!" "Support my head with thy hands, for I desire to sit in my holy place where I am accustomed to pray, that sitting there I may call upon my Father." And thus on the floor of his closet, chaunting the Gloria Patri, he had just strength to proceed to the end of the phrase, and died with the last words (Spiritali Sancto) on his lips.

The date of Bede's death is accurately fixed in the year 735, by the circumstance that in that year the Feast of the Ascension fell upon the 27th of May. He was buried at Yarrow, and, according to William of Malmesbury, the following epitaph was placed on his tomb:

"Presbyter hic Bede requiescat carne sepultus.
Dona, Christe, animam in coelis gaudere per ævum;
Daque illi sophie debetari fonte, cul jam
Suspiravit evans intento semper amore."

Bede has given us, at the conclusion of his Ecclesiastical History, the following list of the works which he had composed previously to that time, (A.D. 731.) 1. A commentary on Genesis, as far as the twenty-first chapter inclusive. Part of this work will be found in the editions of Bede's collected works; the rest was edited by Henry Wharton, in his collection of Tracts by Bede. 2. A treatise on the tabernacle and its vessels, and on the vestments of the priests, in three books. 3. A commentary on the first thirty-one chapters of the first book of Samuel, (usque ad mortem Saulis), in three books. 4. The treatise de ædificatione Templi, (an allegorical interpretation of the temple of Solomon,) in two books. 5. Detached observations on the books of Samuel and Kings. (In Regium librum xxx. questiones.) 6. A commentary on the Song of Solomon, in seven books. 7. A commentary on the Proverbs of Solomon, in three books. 8. Glosses on Isaiah, Daniel, the Twelve Prophets, and part of Jeremiah, extracted from St. Jerome. 9. On Ezra and Nehemiah, in three books. 10. On the Song of Habacuc, in one book. 11. On the book of Tobit, (In Librum beati patris Tobie, explanations allegorice de Christo et ecclesia,) in one book. 12. Heads of readings, (capitula lectionum), on the Pentateuch and on the books of Joshua and Judges. 13. A commentary in libros Regum et Verba dierum. 14. A commentary on the book of Job. 15. On the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. 16. On Isaiah, Ezra, and Nehemiah. 17. A commentary on the Gospel of St. Mark, in four books. 18. A commentary on St. Luke, in six books. 19. Homilies on the Gospel, in two books. 20. A compilation from St. Augustine—In Apostolum quæcunque in opusculis sancti Augustini exposita inventi, cuncta per ordinem transcribere curavi. 21. A commentary on the Acts of the Apostles, in two books. 22. Commentaries on the seven Catholic Epistles. 23. A commentary on the Apocalypse, in two books. 24. Heads of readings on the whole of the New Testament, with the exception of the Gospels. 25. A book of Epistles addressed to various persons. These Epistles were in fact tracts addressed to his friends on the following subjects: On the six Ages of the World, (de sex ætatibus sæculi); on the Mansions of the Children of Israel; on the words of Isaiah, Et clauduntur ibi in carcerem, et post dies multos visitantur, (Isa. xxiv. 22); on the Bisextile; on the Equinox, according to Anatolius. The second and third of these tracts are lost. 26. The life of St. Felix, compiled in prose from the metrical life by Paulinus. 27. A corrected edition of the Life of St. Anastasius, which had been inaccurately translated from the Greek. (Librum vitæ et passionis sancti Anastasii, male de Græco translatus, et pejus a quodam imperito emendatus, prout potui, ad sensum cor- rex.) 28. The life of St. Cuthbert, written first in verse, and afterwards in prose. 29. The history of the Abbots of Wearmouth and Yarrow. 30. The Ecclesiastical History. 31. A Martyrology. 32. Hymns, in various metres or rhythms. 33. A book of Epigrams, in Latin verse. 34, 35. The books De Naturâ Rerum and De Temporibus. 36. A larger book de Temporibus. 37. A book de Orthographia, arranged in alphabetical order. 38. A treatise on Metres, (de Metrica Arte), to which was added another, de Schematibus sive Tropis.

To the foregoing list may be added a few books, which are of undoubted authenticity, and which, with one exception, were written subsequently to the completion of the Ecclesiastical History. 39. The Libellus de Situ Urbis Hierusalem, sive de Locis Sanctis, already mentioned as an abridgment from the older work of Adamnan. We know that this tract was published before the appearance of the Ecclesiastical History, in which it is mentioned, and it is singular that it should be omitted in Bede's list. 40. In his old age, soon after the completion of the Ecclesiastical History, Bede wrote (in imitation of St. Augustine) a book of Retractiones, in which with characteristic candour he points out and corrects errors admitted into the writings of his earlier years. 41. The Epistle to Albinus, edited by Mabillon, and written soon after the year 731. 42. The Epistle to Archbishop Egbert, written at the end of the year 734 or in the beginning of 735. 43, 44. The Compilation from Isidore, and the Anglo-Saxon version of St. John, which occupied Bede's last moments.

It will be seen by the foregoing list, that the subjects of the writings of Bede are very diversified. They are the works of a man whose life was spent in close and constant study,—industrious compilations rather than original compositions, but exhibiting profound and extensive learning beyond that of any of his contemporaries. He was not unacquainted with the classic authors of ancient Rome; and his commentaries on the Scriptures show that he understood the Greek and Hebrew languages. His works may be divided into four classes, his theological writings, his scientific treatises, his poetry and tracts on grammatical and miscellaneous subjects, and his historical books. 1. A very large portion of Bede's writings consists of commentaries on the different books of the holy Scriptures, exhibiting great store of information and acuteness of perception, but too much characterized by the great blemish of the mediæval theology, an extravagant attachment to allegorical interpretation. 2. The only scientific treatises of which we can with certainty regard Bede as the author, are those indicated in his own list of his writings. They are still preserved, and, though no better than compilations from other writers, and more especially from Pliny the elder, they exhibit to us all the scientific knowledge possessed by our forefathers until a much later period. The tract De Natura Rerum, which was one of Bede's earliest works, and the Anglo-Saxon abridged translation made in the tenth century, were the text-books of science in England until the twelfth century. 3. His grammatical and philological writings show his judgment and learning in a very favourable point of view. His observations on the structure and characteristics of Latin verse are distinguished by good taste, and are illustrated by examples selected by himself from the best of the classic, as well as from the Christian, Latin poets. He sometimes criticizes Donatus and the older grammarians. Bede's own metrical compositions are a proof rather of his industry than of his genius; they are constructed according to the rules of art, and possess a certain degree of correctness, but are spiritless. 4. As a historian, the name of Bede will ever stand high in the list of our national writers. One of the earliest books of this class which he wrote, was the history of the abbots of his own monastery, published not long after A.D. 716. He composed the life of St. Cuthbert at the request of Bishop Eadfrith and the monks of Lindisfarne, and therefore some time before the year 721. But his most important work composed in his more mature age, was his Ecclesiastical History of the Anglo-Saxons. Upon this work, which was undertaken at the request of two ecclesiastics, Albinus and Nothhelm, he appears to have laboured with great diligence during several years. He derived little assistance from previous writers, for the books he quotes are few and unimportant; but his own reputation at this period of his life, and his acquaintance with the most eminent ecclesiastics of his age, placed within his reach a large mass of valuable original materials. For a comprehensive list of the editions of Bede, we refer to the learned work to which we are indebted for this memoir—Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

The Anglo-Saxon abridged version of Bede's Treatise De Natura Rerum.—Abbreviated from Wright's Biog. Brit. Lit.

Since the publication of the Biog. Brit. Lit., (in 1842,) the public has been favoured with an edit. of The Complete Works of Bede, in the original Latin, collected and accompanied by a new English translation of the Historical Works, and a Life of the Author, by the learned Rev. J. A. Giles, LL.D., comprised in 12 vols. 8vo, 1843-4, pub. at £6 6s.

Beddoes, Thomas, M.D., 1760-1803, an eminent physician and chemist, was born at Shiffnall, in Shropshire. In 1776 he was entered of Pembroke College, Oxford, where he was remarkable for his assiduity in his studies, and proficiency in the Latin tongue. He also made himself acquainted with French, Italian, and German. Dr. B. married Maria Edgeworth's younger sister.

He pub. in 1784, Dissertation on Natural History, from the Italian of Spallanzani, 2d ed., 1790. He added notes to Dr. E. Cullen's trans. of Bergman's Physical and Chemical Essays; and in 1785 trans. the same author's Essay on Elective Attractions. On the death of Dr. Austin he succeeded to the chemical lectureship at Oxford. Not satisfied with his extraordinary attainments in chemistry, physiology, mineralogy, botany, &c., he turned his attention to the interests of politics, education, and political economy, and in 1792 surprised his friends with a poem founded upon Alexander's Expedition to the Indian Ocean. This he passed off as a production of Dr. Darwin's to some enthusiastic admirers of that gentleman's poetry; one of whom had declared that the poem on the Economy of Vegetation was beyond imitation. As another evidence of the comprehensive grasp of his mind, we may mention History of Isaac Jenkins, a Moral Fiction, 1793; Observations on the Nature of Demonstrative Evidence, with Reflections on Language, 1792; A Word in Defence of the Bill of Rights against Gagging Bills, 1795; An Essay on the Public Merits of Mr. Pitt, 1796. Some of Dr. Beddoes's professional Essays are, besides those mentioned, Observations on the Nature and Cure of Calculus, Catarrh, and Fever, 1792; Contributions to Medical and Physical Knowledge, from the West of England, 1799; Popular Essay on Consumption, 1799; Hygeia, 1801-2; On Fever as connected with Inflammation, 1807; Good Advice to Husbandmen in Harvest, &c., 1808. In addition to all his other literary labours he was a contributor to several of the medical and literary journals. See Phil. Trans., 1791-92; Med. Tracts, 1793, '94, '97; Nic. Jour. 1800, '2, '6, '9. See a list of his publications in Watt's Bib. Brit. He was an early patron of Sir Humphry Davy.

"He was a very remarkable man, admirably fitted to promote inquiry, better than to conduct it. . . . He had talents which would have exalted him to the pinnacle of philosophical eminence, if they had been applied with discretion."—SIR HUMPHRY DAVY.

Whilst preparing for the university he resided for two years with the Rev. Samuel Dickerson, who remarks that "His mind was so intent upon literary pursuits, chiefly the attainment of classical learning, that I do not recollect his having devoted a single day, or even hour, to diversions or frivolous amusements of any kind."

A life of Dr. Beddoes was pub. by Dr. Stock in 1811.

Beddoes, Thomas Lovell, 1803-1849, son of the above, and nephew to Maria Edgeworth, was entered in his 17th year of Pembroke College, Oxford. In 1822 he pub. The Bride's Tragedy.

"With all its extravagancies, and even sillinesses and follies, it shows far more than glimpses of a true poetical genius, much tender and deep feeling, a wantoning sense of beauty, &c."—Blackwood's Mag., xiv. 723.

The Edinburgh Review prefaces an extract by remarking:

"The following will show the way in which Mr. Beddoes manages a subject that poets have almost reduced to commonplace. We thought all similes for the violet had been used up; but he gives us a new one, that is very delightful."

"The ambition that had suggested The Bride's Tragedy died in the effort of producing it. As with his school fellows, now with the poets, his power once acknowledged, he abandoned further competition."

After his death a vol. of his Poems was pub., with a memoir of the author. Works, including Death's Jest-Book, 2 vols.

"All that we have quoted, fragmentary as it is, proclaims a writer of the highest order;—magnificent diction, terse and close in expression, various and beautiful in modulation, displaying imaginative thought of the highest reach, and sweeping the cords of passion with a strong and fearless hand."—London Examiner.

Beddome, Benjamin. Exposition on the Baptist Catechism, 1752. 20 Short Discourses, pub. from his MSS., 1805.

"Evangelical and practical."—BICKERSTETH.

They are commended by Robert Hall, of Leicester.

"As a preacher, Mr. Beddome was universally admired for the piety and unction of his sentiments, the facility of his arrangement, and the purity, force, and simplicity of his language; all which was recommended by a delivery perfectly natural and graceful. His printed Discourses, taken from the MSS. which he left behind him at his decease, are fair specimens of his usual performance in the pulpit. They are eminent for the qualities already mentioned; and their merits, which the modesty of the author concealed from himself, have been justly appreciated by the religious public."—ROBERT HALL.

Bedel, Henry. The Mouth of the Poore, Lon., 1571, 16mo.

Bedell, Gregory Townsend, D.D., 1793-1834, for twelve years Rector of St. Andrew's Episcopal Church in Philadelphia, enjoyed a wide reputation as a devoted pastor, an excellent preacher, and a zealous promoter of religious literature. Besides editing many books, he was author of a number of excellent works. 1. Ezekiel's Vision. 2. Is it well? 3. It is well. 4. Onward, or Christian Progression. 5. Pay Thy Vows. 6. Renunciation. 7. Way Marks. 8. Sermons, with Biographical Sketch of the author by Step. H. Tyng, D.D., 2 vols. 8vo. He wrote several works for the Amer. S. S. Union. This exemplary man was remarkable for abundant labours persevered in under great bodily indisposition. His biographer remarks,

"For several of the last years of his life he was kept in being and in active effort, beyond any of the expectations of his friends. The kind providence of God had favoured him with the kind attentions of a physician, Dr. John K. Mitchell of Philadelphia, [see the name in this volume,] whose remarkable skill in his profession, united with the tenderest concern for his patient's comfort, a clear understanding of his constitution and habits, and the most untiring assiduity in watching over his health, was blessed from above to the preservation of his life, and mitigating his sufferings, for several years after it was supposed by others that he was very near the end of his course."

As a pulpit orator, Dr. Bedell was greatly admired.

"Remarkable as were these many traits of excellence, it was in the pulpit that the pastor shone with the highest lustre. Clear, simple, chaste, logical, impassioned, he combined the most opposite qualities; and, although reduced almost to a skeleton by consumption, his magnificent voice, with its clear enunciation and diversified intonation, could be heard at an almost incredible distance. . . . Hopes of heaven, fears of hell, the beauty of holiness, the deformity of sin, the goodness, the mercy, and the justice of God, were in turn his theme; and never did his people hear abler expositions, or more affectionately eloquent appeals."—J. K. MITCHELL, M.D.: Religious Souvenir, 1836.

Bedell, William, D.D., 1570-1641, Bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh in Ireland, was one of the most exemplary characters in ecclesiastical history. He was born at Black Notley in Essex, studied in Emanuel College, Cambridge, was made provost of Trinity College, Dublin, in 1627, and consecrated bishop in 1629. He was chaplain to Sir Henry Wotton, ambassador to the republic of Venice. Adapting himself to the flock which he served, he introduced the reading of the Common Prayer in his cathedral in the Irish tongue; he caused Archbishop Daniel's Irish trans. of the New Testament to be circulated; and had a trans. made into that language of the books of the Old Testament; and also of some homilies of Chrysostom and Leo, in which the Scriptures are held up to reverence.

The trans. of the Old Testament was pub. after his death, (1685, 4to.) at the expense of the Hon. Robert Boyle. Bishop Burnet wrote an account of his life, pub. in 1685.

His Life, with Letters by Bishop Burnet, is "A very useful work, containing in the appended Letters, a good reply to Popery."—BICKNAP.

Bedford, Arthur, 1668-1745, studied at Brasenose College, Oxford, and took holy orders in 1688. In 1724 he removed to Hoxton, having been chosen chaplain to the Haberdashers' Company at that place, and remained there until his death.

The Evil and Danger of Stage Plays; showing their natural tendency to destroy Religion, and introduce a general corruption of Manners, in almost two thousand instances, taken from the plays of the last two years, against all the methods lately used for their reformation, Lon., 1706, 8vo. This work was much enlarged, and pub. in 1719 under the title of A Serious Remonstrance in behalf of the Christian Religion against the horrid Blasphemies and Impieties which are still used in the English Play Houses.

"This is a very curious work, consisting for the most part of a multitude of objectionable passages taken from the plays, chiefly, at the time, though some of them are from Shakespeare and other early dramatists, classed under the particular head of the offence contained in them."

He also gives a catalogue of "above fourteen hundred texts of Scripture, which are mentioned, either as ridiculed and exposed by the stage, or as opposite to their present practice."

"This is a very elaborate work, and displays much learning and research. The hypothesis which it espouses, however, which is the correctness of the Hebrew numbers, has been set aside, and the work altogether superseded, by the valuable publication of Dr. Hales."—Orme's Bib. Bib.

Beecher, Lyman, D.D., b. Oct. 12, 1775, at N. Haven, Conn., grad. at Yale Coll. 1797, and studied divinity under President Dwight. In 1798, became pastor of a church at East Hampton, L.I., and from 1810 to '26 was pastor of the First Church of Litchfield, Conn. He became pastor of the newly-established Hanover St. Church, Boston, and took an active part in the opposition to Dr. Channing and others in the controversy which occurred among members of a number of the churches of New England in 1826. In 1832, he became President of the Lane Theological Seminary at Cincinnati, and, at the same time, had charge of the Second Presbyterian Church of that city. Since 1842 he has resided at Boston. He has written very effectively in the cause of temperance. 1. Plea for the West, N. York, 18mo. 2. Serms. on Various Occasions, N. York, 8vo, 1842. 3. Views in Theology, 12mo. 4. have been pub. under his own supervision, Bost., 3 vols. 12mo. Three sons and two daughters of Dr. Beecher occupy a place in our Dictionary.

Beechey, Sir Frederic William, 1796-1856, distinguished himself by his enterprise in voyages of exploration to the Pacific and Behring's Strait, and to the northern coast of Africa. He was author of Narrative of a Voyage to the Pacific and Behring's Strait in the years 1825-28, Lon., 1831, 2 vols. 4to, pub. at £4 4s. Proceedings of the Expedition to explore the Northern Coasts of Africa in 1821, '22, &c., Lon., 1827, 4to, pub. at £3 3s., H. W. Beechey co-author. A Voyage of Discovery towards the North Isle, Lon., 1843, 8vo.

The Botany of Capt. B.'s Voyage to the Pacific and Behring's Strait was pub. in 10 numbers, 4to, 1834-41, at £7 10s.; the Zoology in 1839, 4to, at £5 5s.; both by that enterprising publisher Henry G. Bohn, London.

"Captain Beechey's Narrative, we venture to predict, will be generally considered as the most interesting of the whole series of recent voyages. Part of this distinction it undoubtedly owes to the much greater variety and extent of his field of observation, but part of it likewise belongs to the superiority of his powers of composition. His whole work, though consisting of topics of boundless diversity, hangs so capitally together, that we cannot hope, either by outline or extract, to give a just conception of its interest."—*Lon. Behn, Aphra, Aphara, or Afra, d. 1689, was the daughter of Mr. Johnson, Governor of Surinam. She resided for some time at Antwerp, where she was employed as a secret agent of the English government. She pub. Poems, 1st vol. 1684; 2d 1685; 3d 1688: these were songs and miscellanies by Rochester, Eliezer, herself, and others. She also wrote 17 plays, and several histories and novels. See edit. in Lowndes's Bibl. Manual. She was the authoress of the celebrated letters between A Nobleman and His Sister, and 8 love-letters of her own to Lycidas. Oronokoo, the American Prince, a Novel, (from which Southern borrowed his Tragedy,) was the fruit of her personal acquaintance with that noted personage. The paraphrase of (Ebone's) Epistle to Paris, in the English translation of Ovid's Epistles, is Mrs. Behn's:

"I was desir'd to say that the author, who is of the fair sex, understood not Latin; but if she do not, I am afraid she has given us who do, occasion to be ashamed."—Dryden's Preface to trans. of Ovid.

But Dryden did not always weigh his words. The licentiousness of Mrs. Behn's pen is a disgrace to her sex, and the language. Pope, by no means fastidious, yet rebukes Mrs. B. in a well-known couplet:

"The stage how loosely does Astrea tread," &c.

"Most of her comedies have had the good fortune to please: and tho' it must be confessed that she has borrowed very much, not only from her own Country Men, but likewise from the French Poets: yet it may be said in her behalf, that she has often been forc'd to it through haste; and has borrowed from others Stores rather of Choice than for want of Wit of her own."—Langbaine's Dramatic Poets.

"But when you write of Love, Astrea, then Love dips his Arrows where you wet your pen.
Such charming Lines did never Paper grace;
Soft as your Sex, and smooth as Beauty's Face."
CHARLES COTTON.

"It is no wonder that her wit should gain her the esteem of Mr. Dryden, Mr. Southern, and other men of genius."—Biog. Dram.

The author endeavours from the direct evidence of the Scriptures themselves, to determine the positions of the countries and places mentioned in the Old Testament, and the order in which they were peopled; and to explain the Origin and Filiation of the various races of mankind, and of the languages spoken by them. It is intended to be completed in another volume."—Lowndes.

Bekinsau, John, 1496-1559, a native of Wiltshire, studied at New College, Oxford, where he was noted for his proficiency in the Greek tongue. He wrote De Supremo et Absoluto Regis Imperio, printed at London in 1546, in 8vo, and subsequently in the first volume of Monarchia Romani Imperii, &c., by Melchior Goldast at Francofurt, 1621, fol. Dibdin mentions a doubtful edition of 1537.

Belcher, or Belchier, Dabridgecourt, was admitted at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, 1598, removed to Christ Church, Oxford, where he took B.A. in 1600. He trans. into English Hans Beerport, his Risible Comedy of See me and See me not, printed Lon., 1618, 4to. Phillips and Winstanley erroneously credit Nash with this piece. Wood ascribes some other pieces to him. William Belcher, his father, was a friend of Guillim the herald, who takes occasion to commend him as "A man very complete in all gentlemanlike qualities, a lover of arts, and a diligent searcher after matters pertaining to honour and contiguity."—Display of Heraldry.

The gentleman so lauded prefixed some Latin lines to the Display, in which he enumerates some early English authors on heraldry:

"Armorum primus Wynlyn Me wordcus artem

Of his History of New Hampshire, vols. 1st and 2d are historical, vol. 3d relates to climate, soil, produce, &c.

"His deficiency in natural science, as manifested in his history of New Hampshire, is rendered more prominent by the rapid progress of natural history since his death. His Foresters is not only a description of American manners, but a work of humour and wit, which went into a second edition."—Allen's American Biog. Dic.

Bell. The General and Particular Principles of Animal Electricity and Magnetism, &c., in which are found Dr. Bell's Secrets and Practices, Lon., 1792, 8vo.

"Most wonderful Dr. Bell! We will not rob you of any of your secrets by transcribing them: if our readers wish to explore them they may buy the book, and pay for it."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Bell, Andrew, D.D., 1753-1832, obtained much celebrity as the introducer into England of what is called the Madras system of education. Joseph Lancaster is considered by some as entitled to this honour, but it is thought by many that the credit belongs to Dr. B. His principal work is National Education, &c., 1812, 8vo. A list of publications upon the subjects of the Bell and Lancaster Question, and education, and a Review will be found in the Lon. Monthly Review, vol. lxviii., 1812.

"The boys at Madras taught so well, and the school under their teaching prospered so much, that the doctor became intoxicated with the mode, and even allowed himself to suppose that in all cases and circumstances, teaching by the pupils themselves is better than teaching by masters. This is a supposition really too weak to bear being refuted."

"The rhetorical punctuation introduced by Mr. Bell gives an astonishing effect to the delivery of any passage, being perfectly in unison with the respiratory and vocal powers."

Cabinet: Original Essays, 2 vols. 8vo. Count Clermont, tragedies, and other poems, p. 8vo.

Bell, Beaupré, d. 1745, an antiquary, assisted Blomefield in the History of the County of Norfolk.

"My late friend, Mr. Beaupré Bell, a young gentleman of most excellent knowledge in medals, whose immature death is a real loss to this part of learning, was busy in putting out a book like that of Patoral, and left his manuscripts, plates, and coins to Trinity College, Cambridge."—STURKLEY: Memoirs of Cuvierius.

Bell, Benjamin, an eminent surgeon, a native of Edinburgh, pub. a number of professional and other works, Edin., 1778-92. His principal work is A System of Surgery, Edin., 8vo. Vol. 1, 1783; 2 and 3, 1784; 4, 1785; 5, 1787; 6, 1788. 7th edit., 1801, in 7 vols., trans. into French by Bosquillon, Paris, 1796, 6 vols. 8vo; into German by E. G. Hebenstreit, Leipzig, 1784-89, 7 vols. 8vo; again in 1792-99, and 1804-10, 8vo. His first work, Treatise on the Theory and Management of Ulcers, Edin., 1778, 8vo, reached its 7th edit. in 1801. Trans. into German and French.

"His System of Surgery for a long time held the first place in Medical libraries, and may still be referred to with advantage, as it affords a true picture of the state of the art at his time, and does the author credit for his endeavours to divest it of the useless machinery with which it was then encumbered."

Bell, Benjamin, of Wigton. Con. to Med. Com., 1789.

Bell, Sir Charles, 1778-1842, was a native of Edinburgh, and Professor of Surgery in the university of that city. He settled in London in 1806, where he soon became highly distinguished for skill and professional knowledge. System of Dissections, Edin., 1798-99. Essay on the Anatomy of Expression in Painting, Lon., 1806, 4to. The plates for the 8vo edit. have been reduced in size, and suffer materially in consequence. The 2d edit. of the 4to size was pub. in 1824. 4th ed. roy. 8vo, 1847. The illustrations of the author's works were all drawn by himself.

"The artist, the writer of fiction, the dramatist, the man of taste, will receive the present work (which is got up with an elegance worthy of its subject) with gratitude, and peruse it with a lively and increasing interest and delight."—Lon. Christian Remembrancer.

Illustrations of the Great Operations of Surgery: Tropan, Hernia, Amputation, Aneurism, and Lithotomy, fol., 20 c. p. engravings, 1821 and 1841.

"This is one of the most important works of its class. It is needless to say that Sir Charles Bell stands in the very first rank of practical contributors to the scientific literature of this country."

Anatomy of the Brain, 1811, 4to. Diseases of the Urethra, &c., 3d ed., with Notes by John Shaw, 1822, 8vo. The Hand, its Mechanism and Vital Endowments, as evincing Design, Lon., 1833, 8vo. This is the fourth Bridge-water Treatise.

"The book affords a great deal of interest and instruct the mind, and to invite it, by a promise of much rational amusement, to studies that may not appear at first sight to be susceptible of such a purpose."—Lon. Monthly Review.

"Sir Charles enters into the whole physical system of man, to the exposition of which who can be more competent?"—Lon. Quarterly Review.

"He has by a series of experiments, performed more than twenty-two years ago, determined many important questions relative to the functions of the nervous system."

See his Nervous System of the Human Body, &c., 3d ed., 1844, 8vo, and other works. But Alexander Walker in The Nervous System, Lon., 1814, speaking of his own early discoveries, declares that the more recent doctrine of Bell, Magendie, &c., is a plagiarism upon him.

"An inversion and a blunder, associated with useless experiments, which they have neither understood nor explained."

"You are a bold man, Mr. Walker, and it is to be feared you think too favourably of yourself. It may be true what you say, but modesty and genius are very usually twins."—Lon. Monthly Review, 1833.

"If we were required to point out the work in our language which approaches more nearly than all others to the beau ideal of an elementary treatise in jurisprudence, combining the various requisites of theory and practice. In the most perfect harmony, we should, without hesitation, name Bell's Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland."

Mr. Bell's works are highly esteemed. His Treatise on the Law of Bankruptcy in Scotland, 2 vols. 8vo, Edin., 1804, is said to have been the first general treatise written upon the law of Bankruptcy in Scotland.

Mr. Bellamy did not relish such criticism, and pub. Lon., 1816, 8vo, A Reply to the Quarterly Review, a production which is condemned by Rev. J. W. Whitaker as "An intemperate pamphlet, full of the strongest and most glaring immaterialities." See also Lon. Quar. Rev., xix. 297-298.

Mr. Whitaker has accused the falsehood of many of Mr. Bellamy's assertions, and his ignorance of the Hebrew language.—Lowman. Baidon has a poor author been so berated. The Edinburgh Reviewers declared that the appropriate title would be

"The fifty fables paraded from the original Hebrew by John Bellamy."

And Mr. Orme is as little complimentary in the assurance that

Mr. Bellamy is an original and striking writer, but taking the harder features of religion, without the winning and loving grace of the gospel. He is useful in showing the danger of Antinomian perversion. There is great declamation, marking the confidence of a man who feels the truth.—Burman.

His ability to illustrate the truths of the gospel, and to trace them through all connections and dependencies, and to impress them on the conscience and heart, has been pronounced by Dr.

"The author's leading object is to discriminate between the law and the gospel, and to define and illustrate the duties which they respectively require. Bellenden, Sir, or Dr., John. See BALLENDEN.

Bellenden, William, more generally known by his Latin name of Gualterus Bellendenus, a native of Scotland, humanity professor at Paris in 1662.—Ducrocq. James VI. appointed him Magister Supplimentum Libellorum, i. e. a Reader of Petitions. He resided chiefly at Paris. In 1666 he pub. Cicero's Princes; an exposition of the duties of a ruler, illustrated by the precepts of Cicero: to this piece is prefixed De Processu et Scripturis Rei Politicæ. In 1612 was pub. his Cicero's Consul Senator Senatusque Romanus; to the 2d ed. of this dissertation, pub. in 1616, was appended the Libro de Statu Principis Orbis.

"The first two books are, in a general sense, political; the last relates entirely to the Roman polity, but holds much political precept on this. Bellenden seems to have taken a more comprehensive view of history in his first book, and to have reflected more philosophically on it than perhaps any one had done before; at least, I do not remember any work of an early age which reminds me so much of Vico and the Grandeur et Décadence de Montesquieu. We can hardly make an exception for Bodin, because the first is so much more regularly historical, and so much more concise. The first book contains little more than thirty pages. Bellenden's learning is considerable, and without that pedantry of quotation which makes most books of the age intolerable. The latter parts have less originality and much of thought."—Millar's Lib. Hist. Agn.

The three treatises were reprinted at London in 1787, with a Latin preface, by Dr. Samuel Parr; in this preface, Parr celebrates Burke, Fox, and Lord North as "the three English luminaries in oratory and politics." The idea was suggested by Bellenden's De Tribus Luminibus Romanorum, a piece originally intended to eulogize Cicero, Seneca, and Pliny. Only the first part of this, that relating to Cicero, appeared at Paris, 1634, folio, (one copy, 1834;) Bellenden having died before he had time to arrange his papers relating to the other two. From this work Conyers Middleton is charged by Wharton, in his Essay on Pope, (ii. p. 324,) to have taken the idea of writing Cicero's history in his own words, and also to have taken the whole arrangements adopted, without acknowledgment, by himself.

Dr. Parr, in the preface referred to, repeats the same charge. Of this piece Mr. Hallam remarks:

"The celebrated preface of the editor has had the effect of eclipsing the original author; Parr was constantly read and talked of; Bellenden never."

Mr. De Quincy hardly permits even Parr's Preface to escape his wholesale castigation of the "Birmingham Doctor."

"Not one work of Dr. Parr's is extant which can, without laughter, assume that important name. The preface to Bellenden is, after all, by much the weightiest and most regular composition, and the least of a fugitive tract. Yet this is but a jeu d'esprit, or classical production. And we believe the case to be unexampled, that upon so slender a basis, a man of the world, and reputed a man of sense, should set up for an author. Well might the author of the Pursuits of Literature (1797) demand—'What has Dr. Parr written?' A sermon or two, rather long; a Latin preface to Bellendenus, (rather long, too,) consisting of a cento of Latin and Greek expressions applied to political subjects, &c."—Philosophical Writers.

But Dr. Irving considers this celebrated Preface to be worthy of high praise:

"It is written in a style of elegant and powerful Latinity, but is too much replenished with modern politics, and, in the opinion of some readers, is not free from a considerable mixture of pedantry. It is, however, such a composition as no other Englishman of that period could perhaps have produced."—Encyc. Brit.

And why not? All extravagance, whether in praise or censure, is pretty sure to be incorrect. The Preface gave rise to several attacks; Remarks, &c., 1787; Animadversions, &c., 1788; The Parriad, by Chapman, 1788; An Epistle, &c.

Bellers, Fettiplace. Delineation of Universal Law; being an abstract of an Essay towards deducing the elements of Universal Law, from the principles of knowledge and nature of things, in five books. 1. Of Books in general. 2. Of Private Law. 3. Of Criminal Law. 4. Of the Law of Magistracy. 5. Of the Law of Nations, Lon., 1740, 4to; 2d ed., 1754.

"This is a very curious production. It can hardly be called a book, being merely a table of the contents of a proposed treatise, and containing nothing but the heads of divisions under which Bellers proposed to write a work on Universal Law. The author spent twenty years in studying his subject and maturing his plan. It is with a feeling of regret, mingled with something like reproach, that we find the labours of twenty years so wasted, and reflect upon the great expenditure of time and diligence that has been destitute of any useful result."—Martin's Legal Bibl.

But are twenty years' intellectual entertainment, and habits of mental discipline, and acquisition of useful knowledge, to be counted for nothing? In 1759 Mr. Bellers pub. a treatise, (in 4to,) The Ends of Society.

Belmeis, or Beaumes, Richard de, I., Bishop of London, consecrated 1108, is said by Tanner to have written a treatise in verse, addressed to Henry I. The MS. was in the Monastery of Peterborough.

Belmeis, or Beaumes, Richard de, II., Bishop of London, consecrated in 1151, is mentioned by Robert Gale as the author of Codex Niger, or Black Book of the Exchequer.

Belmeys, John, Joannes Eboracensis, or John of York, of the 12th century, is said by Bale and Pits to have written 32 Letters to Thomas Becket, An Invective against the same, and certain Elegant Orations; Leland mentions Aurea Joannis Eboracensis Historia, but is uncertain whether this John of York is the same with our author. Indeed, Leland "could not find any thing certainly written" by Belmeys.

Beloe, Rev. William, 1756-1817, was the son of a tradesman of Norwich. After spending some time under the care of the celebrated Dr. Parr at Stanmore, he entered Bene't or Corpus Christi, College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1779. Removing to London, in conjunction with Mr. Nares, he established the British Critic, as an organ of what are styled high-church, i. e. loyal and conservative, principles, in opposition to the dangerous dogmas of the sympathizers with the French Revolution. In 1796 he was presented to the rectory of Allhallows, London-wall. In 1797 Bishop Pretyman collated him to a stall in Lincoln Cathedral; and in 1805 Bishop Porteus to one in St. Paul's. In 1804 he was appointed one of the assistant librarians to the British Museum. Mr. Beloe's publications are the following: An Ode to Miss Boscawen, 4to, 1783. Trans. of the Rape of Helen, with notes, 4to, 1786. Poems and Translations, 8vo, 1788. The History of Herodotus, from the Greek, with notes, 4 vols. 8vo, 1799. Trans. of Alciphron's Epistles, 1791. Trans. of the Attic Nights of Aulus Gellius, 1795.

"An excellent and the only translation of a difficult and instructive author."—Harwood.

"The Commonplace Book of an elegant scholar, and the most amusing miscellany of antiquity, containing anecdotes and arguments, scraps of history, pieces of poetry, and dissertations on various points in philosophy, geometry, and grammar—all just as noted down at Athens, in the 2d century after Christ."

Miscellanies, 3 vols. 12mo, 1795. Trans. of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, from the French, 4 vols. 12mo. Joseph, from the French of M. Bitanbé, 2 vols. 12mo. A Fast Sermon, 1804. Anecdotes of Literature and Scarce Books, 6 vols. 8vo, pub. 1806-12. Brief Memoirs of the Leaders of the French Revolution. Mr. Beloe was one of the authors of the Biographical Dictionary, 15 vols. 8vo, in which he was assisted by Messrs. Tooke, Morrison, and Nares. He also contributed several articles to the Gentleman's Magazine, and many to the British Critic, of which he was the editor. After the decease of Mr. Beloe appeared The Sexagenarian, or the Memoirs of a Literary Life, 2 vols. 8vo, 1817, written by Mr. B., and edited by a friend. This work contains many amusing anecdotes of the author's literary contemporaries, and the freedom of his strictures is remarkable. Mr. Lowndes condemns it in no measured terms:

"These volumes for presumption, mis-statement, and malignity have rarely been exceeded, or even equalled."

In the next year, 1818, a 2d edit. appeared, in which many passages of the 1st were omitted. Mr. B.'s trans. of Herodotus has been commended by M. Larcher, whose knowledge of the original will hardly be disputed. Beloe drew both from this author's researches, and from the late discoveries in Africa. Classical critics are too apt to despise modern illustrations of ancient lore.

"A very valuable and elaborate performance. The language of the translation is smooth and elegant; nor will any but the fastidious critic, who is often condemned to the drudgery of weighing words and measuring sentences, complain that it is not sufficiently literal. We must, however, remark that, though in general deserving of the highest praise, we think that Mr. B. has been more diffuse and paraphrastic than was necessary; but this is a trifling defect, and let it be remembered, that no translation can be close, and, at the same time, elegant. In publishing this edition of Herodotus, it is easy to perceive that the translator has spared no labour. His work is enriched with a variety of learned and amusing notes. Wesmeling and Larcher, indeed, supplied him with much useful information and critical sagacity, but a great many Meta, anecdotes, parallels, and illustrations, have been diligently collected from ancient writers, modern travels, &c. The work, therefore, if we mistake not, will be found very complete, and will prove a treasure of historical knowledge to readers of every description."—Analytical Review.

"The translation is held in very great esteem, and is justly considered the best we have of this important historian, and very Highly creditable to the talents of Mr. Beloe, though, as a translator, he too frequently loses sight of his author: It is illustrated with very excellent selections of notes, which are partly original and partly taken from the writings of Major Rennell, the notes of Larcher, and other valuable publications."—Moss's Classical Bibliography.

The Anecdotes of Literature and Scarce Books is a very valuable store-house of Bibliographical matter. It has now itself become a "Scarce Book," and the Bibliographer should not fail to secure a copy when the chance occurs—which is seldom. The Anecdotes had the great advantage of the careful revision and corrections of that eminent judge of books, the Bishop of Ely, who died before the 6th volume was published. The libraries and the literary aid of the Marquis of Stafford, the Bishop of Rochester, Mr. Barnard, Mr. Douce, Mr. John Kemble, Mr. Malone, Mr. Chalmers, Mr. Watt, and Mr. Nares, were placed at the service of Mr. Beloe whilst engaged in the preparation of this work.

"A work replete with entertainment and instruction."—Lon. Gent. Mag.

"A work containing much bibliographical information, and extracts from curious works."—LOWNDES.

Mr. Beloe lost his situation at the British Museum in consequence of the thieving propensities of a wretch whom he had permitted to examine some of the books and drawings belonging to the library. See his account of this unfortunate affair in Preface to the Anecdotes. (Copied in Gent's Mag., 1817, Part i.) We extract a few lines:

"A man was introduced at the Museum, with the sanction of the most respectable recommendation. I mention not his name—the wounds of his own conscience must be so severe a punishment that I shall not increase his sufferings. . . . He proved to be dishonest; he perjured valuable property which was in my custody, and it was thought that the good government of the institution required my dismissal."

Belsham, James. Canadin, Lon., 1760, 4to.

Belsham, Thomas, 1750-1829, the son of a dissenting minister at Bedford, embraced in 1789 the Unitarian opinions of Dr. Priestley, whom he succeeded as minister at Hackney when Priestley removed to America. The Unitarian Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge and the Practice of Virtue was founded at the suggestion of Mr. Belsham. Mr. B. pub. many occasional sermons. A number of his Discourses Doctrinal and Practical were pub. in 2 vols.; also Discourses on the Evidence of the Christian Religion; Elements of Logic and Mental Philosophy; A Calm Review of the Scripture Doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, including a brief Review of the Controversy between Dr. Horsley and Dr. Priestley, Lon., 1811, 8vo; Memoirs of the late T. Lindsey, &c., Lon., 1812, 8vo; A Review of American Unitarianism, &c., 2d edit., 1815, 8vo; A Review of Mr. Wilberforce's Treatise; this work was noticed by Rev. Andrew Fuller, and in the Appendix to Dr. Magee's Discourses on the Atonement; Letters to the Bishop of London, in Vindication of the Unitarians, Lon., 1815, 8vo.

"Mr. Belsham seems to be as deeply infected as any man with the itch for writing. Seldom a year passes without his sending forth two or three treatises. What degree of circulation these may obtain among his partisans, we have no means of knowing; but certainly, as to the public at large, they fall nearly still-born from the press. . . . He has shewn, as is customary with him, some adroitness in misunderstanding and perverting expressions."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

Mr. B. had an important share in the New Testament in an Improved Version, upon the basis of Abp. Newcome's New Translation, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, Lon., 1808, 8vo.

"It pretends to be placed upon the basis of Abp. Newcome's, by which it is basely insinuated that the prime was a Socinian. Nothing can be more false. Abp. Newcome's translation is strictly orthodox on all the great points relating to the divinity and atonement of Christ."—LOWNDES.

"Evidently prepared by persons without sufficient scholarship for any real improvement."—Rose's Biog. Dict.

"It mangles and misrepresents the original text, perverts the meaning of its most important terms, and explains away all that is valuable in the doctrinal system of Christianity."—OMER.

The Improved Version was also reviewed by Archbp. Lawrence, Dr. Nares, Rev. T. Rennell, Chas. Danberry, John Bevan, and Robert Halley. See Lowndes's Brit. Librarian, p. 219.

The Epistles of Paul the Apostle translated; with an Exposition and Notes, 1822, 4 vols. 8vo.

"This is one of the most elaborate performances on the Bible which for many years have issued from the Unitarian press. Mr. Belsham has been long known as one of the chief leaders of that party in England, and as one of the principal authors of the Improved Version of the New Testament. The translation of the Epistles of Paul is constructed on the visionary scheme of interpretation of Dr. Taylor of Norwich. The tendency of the work is to subvert all those sentiments respecting sin which are calculated to affect the mind with pain, and those views of the Duty and atonement of Christ which are fitted to afford relief. Mr.

Belsham uses great freedom with the readings of the original text, and still greater with the principles of enlightened interpretation. He shows rather what the New Testament should be in the opinion of a Socinian, than what it really is. The work is full of erroneous doctrines, incorrect learning, affected candour, and forced interpretation."—Orme's Bibl. Bib.

Belsham pub. some other works. The Memoirs of our author with correspondence, &c., was pub. Lon., 1833, 8vo, by John Williams.

Belsham, William, 1753-1827, younger brother of the preceding, was author of a number of historical and political treatises. Essays, philosophical, historical, and literary, Lon., 1789-91, 2 vols. 8vo, several editions.

"On the whole, our general idea of these Essays is, that they discover more extent and variety, than depth, of thinking; but that the good sense and liberal spirit with which they are written, may render them useful to young persons, in assisting them to form a habit of inquiry and reflection."—*Lon. "It gives a concise and judicious summary of the leading causes which produced, of the interesting events which accompanied, and of the principal regulations which followed, the revolution."—Ibid.

In 1793 he pub. Memoirs of the Kings of Great Britain of the House of Brunswick, Lunenburg, 2 vols. 8vo. In 1795 appeared his Memoirs of the Reign of George III., to the Session of Parliament ending 1793, 4 vols. 8vo, 5th and 6th vols., 1801. In 1798 was pub. his History of Great Britain, from the Revolution to the Accession of the House of Hanover, 2 vols. 8vo. These works were incorporated under the title of History of Great Britain, from the Revolution in 1688 to the Conclusion of the Treaty of Amiens, 1802, 12 vols. 8vo, Lon., 1806.

"We congratulate the public on the completion of Mr. Belsham's History, the only one of the period which deserves to be cherished and read among friends of civil liberty, and of the free principles of the Constitution. The style is clear and nervous, without dogmatism, and eloquent without inflammation; while the spirit is temperate, and the details unimpeachable in veracity and impartiality."—Lon. Monthly Mag.

Belsham's History has been honoured by the commendation, qualified, indeed, of no less an authority than Professor Smyth:

"Belsham will, I think, in like manner be found, for a considerable part of his work, very valuable, spirited, intelligent, an ardent friend to civil and religious liberty, and though apparently a Dissenter, not a Sectarian. In his latter volumes, indeed, from the breaking out of the late French war in 1793, he has departed from the equanimity of an historian, and has degenerated into the warmth, and almost the rage, of a party writer. . . . I must observe, that a very good idea may be formed of the general subjects connected with this period, [reign of Anne], and of the original memoirs and documents which should be referred to, by reading the Appendix to Belsham's History: it is very well drawn up. . . . A good general idea may be formed of this crisis [union of England and Scotland] from the History of Belsham. . . . I would recommend to my readers to take the modern publication of Belsham [in studying the political life of Sir Robert Walpole] and to read it in conjunction with Coxe; then to refer occasionally to the two volumes of the correspondence of Coxe; and to refer continually to the Parliamentary debates, which may be read in Cobbett. . . . The History of Belsham is a work, as I have already mentioned, of more merit than would at first sight be supposed. But in the year 1798, after the breaking out of the French war, it loses the character of history, and becomes little more than a political pamphlet; and through the whole of the reign of his present Majesty [George III.] it is so written, that it must be considered as a statement, whether just or not, but certainly only as a statement, on one side of the question, and must therefore, at all events, be compared with the statement on the other side, that is, with the History of Adolphus. . . . These histories [with reference to the American war] are drawn upon very different principles:—Belsham conceiving that the Americans were right in their resistance; Adolphus thinking, certainly wishing his readers to think, that they were entirely wrong: the one written on what are called Whig, the other on Tory, principles of government. The one is, I conceive, sometimes too indulgent to the Congress; the other always so to the English ministry. Belsham, I consider as by far the most reasonable of the two in every thing that is laid down respecting the American War."—Lectures on Modern History.

"Whoever has read this book (and who has not?) will agree with us in opinion that its interest is derived, not less from the manner in which it is written, the personal adventures, and the picture it exhibits of the author's character, than for its splendid and popular antiquarian researches."—STEVENS.

The credit of Belsoni's discoveries was often stolen from him by others. Read the excellent Address to the Mummy in Belsoni's Exhibition, by Horace Smith.

Bendlowes, or Benlowes, Edward, 1602–1676, a native of Essex, was a Fellow-commoner of St. John's College, Cambridge. He was of too easy a nature for his own welfare, and impoverished himself by lavishing his favours on others. He patronized among others, Quarles, Davenant, Payne, and Misher. John Jenkyns was one of his favourites:

"He was much patronised by Edward Benlowes, Esq., who having written a most divine poem entitled Theophila, or Love's Sacrifice, printed at London, 1652, several parts thereof had aims set to them by this incomparable Jenkyns. . . . Mr. Benlowes in his younger days was a Papist, or at least very Popishly affected, and in his elder years a bitter enemy to that party."—Athen. Oxon.

Mr. Benlowes wrote a number of other pieces both in Latin and in English, among which are, Sphinx Theologica, Camb., 1626, 8vo. A Summary of Divine Wisdom, Lon., 1657, 4to. A glance at the glories of Sacred Friendship, Lon., 1657. Oxonii Encomium, Oxon., 1672, fol. Oxonii Elegia, Oxon., 1673. Oxonii Elegia. Truth's Touch Stone; dedicated to his niece, Mrs. Philippa Blount.

"A whole canto of Theophila, consisting of above 300 verses, was turned into elegant Latin verse in the space of one day by that great prodigy of early parts, John Hall of Durham, having had his tender affections ravished with that divine piece."—Athen. Oxon.

Both Pope and Warburton are very severe in their criticisms upon our author. The first tells us that

"Benlowes, propitious to blockheads, bows."

"Benlowes was famous for his own bad poetry, and for patronising bad poets."—WARBURTON.

"Theophila gives us a higher idea of his piety than his poetical talents; though there are many uncommon and excellent thoughts in it. This prayer has been deservedly admired."—GRANGER.

A complete copy of Theophila is very rare. The one in the Naassau sale, (pt. i. 437,) said to be the most perfect known, sold for no less than £26 5s.

Benjamin, Park, was born 1809, at Demerara, in British Guiana, where his father, a merchant from New England, resided for some years. In 1825 he entered Harvard College, which he left before the end of the second year in consequence of bad health. When restored to health, he entered Washington College, Hartford, where he graduated with the highest honours of his class in 1829. In 1830 he became a member of the Law School at Cambridge, and in 1833 was admitted to the Connecticut bar, and upon his removal to Boston soon after, to the courts of Massachusetts. He has been connected editorially with the American Monthly Magazine, The New Yorker, &c. Mr. Benjamin has given many pieces both in prose and verse to the world. With the exception of A Poem on the Contemplation of Nature, read at the time of his taking his degree, Poetry; A Satire, 1843, and Infatuation; A Satire, 1845, his productions are very short.

"Mr. Benjamin's Satires are lively, pointed, and free from malignity or licentiousness. In some of his shorter poems, Mr. Benjamin has shown a quick perception of the ridiculous; in others, warm affections and a meditative spirit; and in more, gayety. His poems are adorned with apposite and pretty fancies, and seem generally to be expressive of actual feelings. Some of his humorous pieces, as the Sonnet entitled Sport, are happily expressed, but his style is generally more like that of an improviser than an artist. He rarely makes use of the burnisher."—Griswold: Poets and Poetry of America.

We refer the reader to The Nautilus, The Tired Hunter, To One Beloved, and The Departed, as poems of exquisite beauty.

We think, to quote the remark of George III. to Dr.

Johnson, that one who writes so well should write more, and favour the world with something of more imposing pretension in the way of volume. Whether it be that the unhappy Joel Barlow's prodigious Columbiad has frightened all succeeding American poets, and deterred them from venturing more than a few stanzas at a time, certain it is that they have a curious fashion of "cutting" up their gems "into little stars."

"As a well-wrought story, it is entitled to particular regard. The inventive faculty of the authoress is not to be disputed: but character, that great, that almost indispensable, requisite in all such performances as the present, is seldom to be found in it."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Bennet, Benjamin, 1674–1726, an eminent Presbyterian minister, pub. among other works, A Memorial of the Reformation, Lon., 1717, 8vo, and A Defence of the same, 1723, 8vo. This work gives the views of the author upon The Reformation and Church History of England to the year 1719. Irenicum; a work on the Trinity, Lon., 1722, 8vo. This work produced a great sensation, and its influence was considerable.

Christian Oratory, or The Devotions of the Closet displayed, 2 vols. 8vo, 1728. Many editions. It was abridged by Mr. Palmer in 1 vol. 8vo.

"A very spiritual and devotional work, that may be read more than once with advantage."—BROCKHAUS.

"Plain, serious, and practical, but sometimes flat, his Christian Oratory is almost his only piece which had been better if some of the instances had been avoided, and the plan more fully completed in a single volume."—DODDGE.

"The title would mislead us as to the nature of the contents, the word oratory being used in the sense of a place for meditation and prayer."

Fourteen Sermons on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, 1730, 8vo.

"This book should have a distinguished place in the library of every theological student, for few books of its size contain a more abundant treasure of divine doctrine."—BODLEY.

Bennet, Christopher, 1617–1655, an English physician, was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford. He corrected and enlarged Dr. Moufet's Health Improvement, Lon., 1655, 4to, and pub. a medical treatise in Latin, under the name of Benedictus, entitled Theatri Tabidorum Vestibulum seu Exercitationes Dianœtice, &c., Lon., 1654, 4to. He left several Latin works in manuscript.

Bennet, George, at one time a Dissenting minister, subsequently in the Church of Scotland. He pub. a work against "a pretence of Reform," Lon., 1796, 8vo; also Olam Haneshemoth, or a View of the Intermediate State, as it appears in the Records of the Old and New Testaments, the Apocryphal Books, in Heathen Authors, the Greek and Latin Fathers, Lon., 1801, 8vo.

"It is a work of various erudition and deep research. And a reader must be very learned who finds not much in it to instruct him; very dull, if he is not delighted with the ingenuity that is displayed even in those parts in which he may see reason to doubt the solidity of the author's argument, and the truth of his interpretations; and very captious, if, in a variety of novel expostions, many of which he may think inadmissible, he finds any thing to give him offence."—BISHOP HOSIAR.

Benoit, or Benedict, De Sainte Maur, who flourished about 1180, was a troubadour, patronised by Henry II., by whose direction, according to Robert Wace, he composed his metrical history of the Dukes of Normandy. This chronicle, which extends to thirty thousand lines,

"Begins with a brief sketch of the cosmographical doctrines of the age, which leads to the account of the origin of the Normans and their first piratical voyages, and the history is continued to the death of Henry I. The larger portion is a mere paraphrase of the Latin histories by Dudo of St. Quentin's, and William of Jumièges, with some slight additions of matter not found in those authorities; but it is inferior as a historical document and as a literary composition to the similar work of Wace, which appears from the first to have enjoyed a greater degree of popularity."—Wright.

"This old French poem is full of fabulous and romantic matter."—Watson's History of English Poetry.

But it has been remarked that if we compare this author with the Norman historians who preceded him, we shall find his statements to be in accordance with theirs. The Chronicle was pub. by Michel, Paris, 1836-38, and '44. The MS. from which it was printed is preserved in the Brit. Museum, Harleian Collection, No. 1717. There is also a MS. in the library of Tours in France.

Benoit's other great poem, which probably preceded the Chronicle, was his metrical romance of the History of Troy. It is "Chiefly a paraphrase of the supposititious history of the Phrygian Dares, with some additions from the similar work published under the name of Dictys; but the Anglo-Norman trouvère, faithful to the taste of his age, has turned the Grecian and Trojan heroes into medieval knights and barons. . . . It contains nearly thirty thousand lines. It is a heavy and dull poem, and possesses little interest at the present day; although it abounds in those repeated descriptions of warfare which constituted the great beauty of such productions in the twelfth century."—Wright.

There is a complete MS. of the Roman de Troye in the Harleian Collection, No. 4482. A MS. is in the Library of St. Mark at Venice, extracts from which are printed by Keller, in his Romvart, p. 86.

These are the only works known to have been written by Benoit. Tyrwhitt ascribes to him a Life of Becket, in Anglo-Norman verse, but M. de la Rue and Mr. Wright decide this to be the production of a later Benoit. M. de la Rue believed him to be the author of a song on the Crusade, at the end of the Harleian MS. containing his chronicle. But the learned Mr. Thomas Wright proves this opinion to be erroneous.

Benson, G. Oaths and Swearing, 1699, 4to.

Benson, George, D.D., 1699-1763, an English Dissenting minister of considerable learning, a native of Cumberland, England, studied at the University of Glasgow. He was the author of a number of theological works, pub. 1725-64. We notice some of the principal. A Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, and the seven Catholic Epistles of Peter, James, and John, Lon., 1734, 4to; best edit. 2 vols. 4to, 1752-56. This was preceded by a Specimen, being a Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistle to Philemon, 1731, 4to. The work is on the plan pursued by John Locke, of making St. Paul his own expositor by illustrative references to various portions of his writings. It has been highly commended.

"Locke, Pierce, and Benson make up a complete commentary on the Epistles; and are, indeed, all in the number of the most ingenious commentators I have ever read. They plainly thought very closely, and attended much to connection, which they have often set in a most clear view. But they all err in too great a fondness for new interpretations, and in supposing the design of the apostles less general than it seems to have been. It must be allowed that Benson illustrates the spirit of Paul sometimes in an admirable manner, even beyond any former writer. See especially his Epistle to Philemon."—Dr. Doddridge.

"This work is a continuation of Locke's attempt to illustrate the Epistles, and, with Pierce's work, completes the design. Benson possessed considerable learning, but no great portion of genius. He was certainly inferior in taste and acumen to his two coadjutors; but still his labours are entitled to respect. Some of his essays, inserted in the commentaries, contain important information on the points on which they treat. His theological sentiments were Arian, verging to Socinian: on this account all his writings require to be read with caution. His Paraphrase on James was translated into Latin by J. D. Michaelis, and published with a preface by Baumgarten, at Halle, in 1747. The preface highly extols the labours of Locke, Pierce, and Benson, and mentions with respect many others of the British commentaries. To this Latin version Michaelis has added many valuable notes of his own."—ORME.

History of the First Planting of Christianity, taken from the Acts of the Apostles and their Epistles, 1735, 2 vols. 4to; best edit. 1756, 3 vols. 4to.

"Though this work does not profess to be a harmony of the Acts of the Apostles and of the Epistles, it may justly be considered as one. Besides illustrating the history of the Acts, throughout, and most of the Epistles by a view of the history of the times, the occasions of the several Epistles, and the state of the churches to which they were addressed, the learned author has incorporated a paraphrased abstract of these Epistles in the order of time when they were written; and has also established the truth of the Christian religion on a number of facts, the most public, important, and incontestable. It is, indeed, a most valuable help to the study of the Epistles; but it is to be regretted that its scarcity renders it accessible to few."—T. H. HORNE.

"Though but a dull book, it is full of important matter, and is of great service in explaining many parts of the book of Acts. It displays very considerable research, a great portion of candour, and an accurate acquaintance with the facts of the Jewish and Roman history which relate to the Christians during the first age of Christianity."—ORME.

The Reasonableness of the Christian Religion, &c., Lon., 1743, 8vo, and 1746, 4to, and 3d ed., 1759, 2 vols. This is an answer to Dodwell's pamphlet, Christianity not founded in Argument, Lon., 1742, 8vo. Doddridge, Leland, Mole, Cooksey, and others also answered Dodwell. Bishop Watson remarks of Benson's reply:

"The author not only advances many arguments in proof of the truth of the Christian Religion, but obviates in a familiar way the chief objections of the Anti-revelationists."

The History of the Life of Jesus Christ, &c., 1764, 4to.

"In this work Dr. Benson discovers much attention to many minute particulars in the history of Jesus, but the principles of his creed prevented him from doing justice to his subject. The work is divided into fifteen chapters, and is accompanied with an appendix containing seven dissertations."—ORME.

This work was left in an incomplete state. See Lon. Congregational Magazine for July, 1833.

Benson, Joseph, 1748-1821, was a Methodist minister of considerable note. He edited a Commentary on the Scriptures, embodying the views of many Biblical critics, among whom John Wesley occupies a prominent place. This work was pub. in 5 vols. 4to, Lon., 1811-18; several subsequent editions.

"An elaborate and very useful commentary on the sacred Scriptures, which (independently of its practical tendency) possesses the merit of compressing into a comparatively small compass the substance of what the piety and learning of former ages have advanced, in order to facilitate the study of the Bible. Its late learned author was particularly distinguished for his critical and exact acquaintance with the Greek Testament."—T. H. HORNE.

This commentary, particularly intended for family use, was pub. under the direction and patronage of the Methodist Conference. Mr. B. pub. Sermons, 1790, '91, '98, 1800, &c. A Defence of the Methodists, 1793, 12mo. A farther Defence, &c., 1794, 12mo. A Vindication of the Methodists, 1800, 8vo. An Apology for the Methodists, 1801, 12mo.

"This publication is apparently written with much candour; and it affords, notwithstanding the mysticism which there may be among them, and which may appear in this book, a very favourable view of those people whose cause it intends to plead. . . . The work is well worthy of perusal."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Remarks on Dr. Priestley's System. A Vindication of Christ's Divinity. After Mr. B.'s decease there was pub. Sermons and Plans of Sermons on important Texts of Holy Scripture, Lon., 1825-27, 8vo; 6 parts in 3 vols. 8vo; 262 Sermons and Plans of Sermons, 3 vols. 8vo, 1831; 219 Sermons and Plans of Sermons, 2 vols. 8vo, 1831.

"The Plans are highly creditable to the piety and talents of the writer; and while they serve as a valuable aid to the young Minister of the Gospel, are suited generally to instruct and improve, to inform the understanding, and to affect the heart."—Christian Observer.

Mr. Benson has been warmly praised in high quarters:

"A sound scholar, a powerful and able preacher, and a profound theologian."—Dr. ADAM CLARKE.

"He seems like a messenger sent from the other world to call men to account."—REV. R. CECIL.

"His forte did not lie in that finished and sustained style, which, however beautiful and attractive it may sometimes be, has a tendency to pall upon the ear; he had little of Cicero, and less of Isocrates, in his composition; his eloquence was Demosthenic."—Lon. Christian Observer.

Benson, William, 1682-1754, commonly known as Auditor (of the Imprest) Benson, was the son of Sir William, formerly Sheriff of London. His first publication was a letter to Sir Jacob Banks upon the Miseries of Sweden after her submission to arbitrary power. Of this letter 100,000 copies were sold in the English language and translations. In 1724 he pub. Virgil's Husbandry, with notes; and in 1739 Letters concerning poetical translations and Virgil's and Milton's arts of verse. In 1740 appeared an edition of Arthur Johnston's Psalms, with a Prefatory discourse; and a criticism on this preface in 1741. In a supplement to this essay he drew a comparison between Johnston and Buchanan, giving the preference to the former. This drew forth an unanswerable defence of Buchanan from the celebrated Ruddiman. His admiration for Milton and Johnson is alluded to by Pope in the Dunciad:

"On two unequal crutches propt he came,
 Milton's on this, on that one Johnston's name."

Pope's indignation, and that of the country at large, was excited by the appointment of Benson to the post of surveyor-general in 1718, in place of Sir Christopher Wren, removed. Dr. Warton, in his notes on Pope, considers that he has treated our author with too much severity:

"Benson is here spoken of too contemptuously. He translated faithfully, if not very poetically, the second book of the Georgics, with useful notes; he printed elegant editions of Johnston's psalms; he wrote a discourse on veridicality; he rescued his country from the disgrace of having no monument erected to the memory of Milton in Westminster Abbey; he encouraged and urged Pitt to translate the Æneid; and he gave Dobson £1000 for his Latin translation of Paradise Lost."

Towards the close of his life he evinced an unconquerable aversion to books, and passed his last days in retirement at his house in Wimbledon. The Rev. Francis Peck dedicated to our author his Memoirs of Cromwell:

"Mr. Benson (I dedicate to) is the same gentleman you mention, and a gentleman, I assure you, of exceeding good sense, and learning, and candour. For my part, I do not see how Westminster Abbey is profaned by a Cenotaph in honour of Milton, considered only as a poet. His politics I have nothing to say to. You or I may write of Milton and Cromwell, and still think as we please."—Mr. Peck to Dr. Grey, Dec. 15, 1739. See Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, and Spence's Anecdotes.

Bentham, Edward, D.D., 1707-1776, a learned divine of the Church of England, was educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford; became vice-president of Magdalen Hall, and Fellow of Oriel College; Prebendary of Hereford, 1743; Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, and Regius professor of divinity, 1763. He pub. occasional sermons, 1722, '44, '50, '72. An Introduction to Moral Philosophy, 1745, 8vo. Advice to a Young Man of Rank upon coming to the University. Reflections upon Logic. Funeral Eulogies upon Military Men, in the original Greek, with Notes. Reflections upon the Study of Divinity, 8vo, 1771. An Introduction to Logic, 1773, 8vo. De Tumultibus Americanis, deque eorum Concitatoribus Senilis Meditatio, etc. This last work was occasioned by some members of Parliament having censured the University of Oxford for addressing the king in favour of the American war.

"Even death itself found him engaged in the same laborious application which he had always directed to the glory of the Supreme Being, and the benefit of mankind; and it was not till he was absolutely forbidden by his physicians, that he gave over a particular course of reading that had been undertaken by him with a view of making remarks on Mr. Gibbon's Roman History."

"Bentham's Reflections upon the Study of Divinity contain many judicious observations: the heads of lectures exhibit, perhaps, as complete a plan of theological studies as was ever delivered."—LOWDES.

Bentham, James, 1709?-1794, brother to the above, also a divine of the Church of England, was educated at

BEN

Trinity College, Cambridge. He pub. Queries to the Inhabitants of Ely, 1757. Considerations, &c. on the State of the Fens near Ely, Camb., 1778, 8vo. Essays on Gothic Architecture, in conjunction with Messrs. Warton, Grosse, and Milner, pub. 1800, 8vo. But Mr. Bentham's principal work is the History and Antiquities of the Conventual and Cathedral Church of Ely, 673-1771, Camb., 1771, royal 4to. This work, pub. at eighteen shillings, and said to be the cheapest work ever published, had reached the price of 12 to 14 guineas before the publication of the 2d edit., 1812, imp. 4to, and 25 copies on elephant paper. William Stevenson pub., in 1817, a supplement to the first, and also one to the second, edition.

"The knowledge of ancient architecture displayed in Bentham's work far exceeded all that had been before written on that subject. The Cathedral of Ely furnished him with examples of almost every variety of style from the Saxon era to the Reformation. The characteristic ornaments of each were carefully studied by him; and his numerous quotations from ancient authors prove his diligence in historical research. In this work was first brought forward the presumed origin of the pointed arch, the chief feature of the Gothic style, on which the whole style seemed to have been formed. This kind of arch Bentham supposed might have been derived from the intersection of two semi-circular arches, such as are seen on the walls of some buildings erected soon after the Norman Conquest. Dr. Milner, the historian of Winchester, has since adopted this hypothesis, and supported it with a degree of learned ingenuity which has given it much celebrity."

The poet Gray has been improperly credited with "the architectural part of the History of Ely Cathedral." See Dr. Milner's error on this subject, (in article Gothic Architecture, in Rees's Cyclopædia,) corrected in the Memoirs of Bentham, prefixed to the new edit. (1812) of the History. To this History the eminent antiquary, Rev. W. Cole of Milton, and Dr. Bentham's brother, were considerable contributors. James Bentham, the son of the author, was the editor of the 2d edition. As the author commenced his history from his father's collections, we have here the pleasing spectacle of three generations being employed on the same work.

"It is probable that Mr. Bentham was determined to the pursuit of ecclesiastical antiquities by the eminent example of Bishop Tanner, (a prebendary of the same stall which Mr. B. afterwards held,) who had honoured the family with many marks of his kindness and friendship."

See Nichols's Literary Anecdotes; Gorton's Biog. Dict.; Chalmers's do.; Memoirs prefixed to the Hist. of Ely, 1812; Notes on Mem. in Suppl. to Hist., 1817.

Bentham, Jeremy, 1747-1832, was a native of London, where his father and grandfather were attorneys. He was so remarkable for an early love of books, that at the age of five years he had acquired among the members of the family the name of "the philosopher." He was admitted in his 14th year of Queen's College, Oxford, where he at once became distinguished among his fellow students. After attending the celebrated Vinerian Lectures of Sir William Blackstone, he was called to the Bar about 1772, but soon abandoned the profession from disgust at the unjust charges to suitors, and other corruptions which he found existing in the machinery of law. Mr. Bentham visited Paris on three different occasions prior to the commencement of the French Revolution. In the second of these visits he became acquainted with the celebrated Brissot de Warville, who has left a graphic sketch of the character of his friend. A still more important event was his introduction to M. Dumont, the Marquis of Lansdowne's Swiss librarian, then residing at Bowood. The literary assistance of this gentleman in amending and polishing his friend's composition, was invaluable. The great object of Mr. Bentham's life was the improvement of legislation and jurisprudence, and the advocacy of the principle of utility as the criterion of right and wrong.

"In the phrase 'the greatest happiness of the greatest number,' I then saw delineated for the first time [in Priestley's pamphlet] a plain, as well as a true, standard for whatever is right or wrong, useful, useless, or mischievous in human conduct, whether in the field of morals or politics."

But the questions immediately occur—What is to be the definition of the greatest happiness? Is it happiness for time or for eternity that should be man's great object? Do not men's actions continually prove that, unassisted by Revelation, they are equally incapable of judging what is their true happiness, and of pursuing it when known? If a supposed utility, rather than a fixed principle, is to direct action, men must judge what utility is, and there may be as many opinions as there are judges;—all cannot be right, and all may be wrong; but obedience to the revealed will of God must in all cases be safe and profitable. Is it to be supposed, then, that the Supreme Being has left his creatures under the constant necessity of action, and has given them no means save their own wild conjectures, of ascertaining either what will please their Creator, or promote their own happiness? Nothing, indeed, more conclusively proves the necessity of a Revelation, than the crude conjectures and childish fallacies, the baseless premises and lame and impotent conclusions, of philosophical and moral speculators, from Socrates to Voltaire, from Zeno to Bentham. Jonathan Dymond, with the simple Word of God as his weapon, can discomfit a host of such "philosophers," and put "to flight all the armies of the alien."

Mr. Bentham's first publication was A Fragment on Government; being an Examination of what is delivered on the Subject in Blackstone's Commentaries, Lon., 1776, 8vo. This work, he tells us, was prompted by "a passion for improvement in those Whaps in which the lot of man is meliorated by it." This was published anonymously. The Lon. Monthly Review indignantly remonstrated upon the writer's treatment of Blackstone:

"We cannot avoid expressing our disgust at the severity with which the justly admired Commentator is treated in the critique now before us. In order to convict him of obscurity and inaccuracy, this anonymous Writer has taken much pains—it must be owned, with some ingenuity—to analyze those passages in the introduction to his work which treat of the subject of Government in general: and has scrutinized every word and idea with a degree of rigour, which few even of the most admired writers would be able to endure. . . . In what the author advances concerning the British constitution, he controverts, with a mixture of argument and rally, many popular opinions; with what success we shall not at present undertake to determine."

His View of the Hard Labour Bill appeared in 1778, and the Principles of Morals and Legislation in 1780. The Defence of Usury was pub. in 1787.

"If we mistake not, this tract will furnish ground for many ample discussions, that will, we hope, terminate in the emancipating the human mind from many great errors that capiti-ly influence the business of human life. . . . We view it as a political gem of the finest water, that requires only to be examined with attention in order to be admired."—Lon. Monthly Review.

"A work unanswered and unanswerable; and not less admirably reasoned than happily expressed."—Edinburgh Review.

"Perhaps the best specimen of the exhaustive discussion of a moral or political question, leaving no objection, however feeble, unanswered, and no difficulty, however small, unexplained; remarkable, also, for the clearness and spirit of the style, for the full exposition which suits them to all intelligent readers, for the tender and skilful hand with which prejudice is touched, and for the urbanity of his admirable apology for projectors."—SIR JAMES MACINTOSH.

The Principles of Morals and Legislation was pub. in 1789, (printed in 1780,) and in the next year he communicated a plan of making convicts useful, in his Panopticon, or the Inspection House. Two years later he pub. Truth versus Ashurst, &c., and in 1795 Supply without Burthen, or Escheat vice Taxation; to which he prefixed his Protest against Law Taxes.

"It appears to us that this Essay is a hasty and undigested performance, and that it required more consideration than the author has bestowed on it."—Lon. Monthly Review.

The same periodical had remarked of the Principles of Morals and Legislation, that Mr. Bentham,

"Like many other men of great and comprehensive minds here seems to have engaged in a pursuit too extensive, perhaps, for the powers of any individual of the human race to execute with precision and propriety."

Mr. Bentham's principal work was first published in French in 1802. It is entitled Traité de Législation Civile et Pénale; précédée de Principes Généraux de Législation, et d'une Vue d'un Corps complet de Droit; terminée par un Essai sur l'influence des Temps et des Lieux relativement aux Loix, Paris, an. x., 1802. This work was translated into French by M. Dumont "d'après les Manuscrits confiés par l'Auteur." We should not omit to notice Mr. R. Hildreth's translation of this work into English, Boston, 2 vols. 12mo, 1840.

Other works of Bentham's are, A Plea for the Constitution, 1803. Scotch Reform Considered, 1808. Defence of Economy against Burke, 1810-17. Ditto against Rose, 1810-17. Elements of the Art of Paeking, 1810-21. Théorie des Peines et des Récompenses, rédigée en Français par Dumont, 1812.

"The law student cannot fail in being much delighted with this work: it is a book replete with original and philosophical thoughts and sound practical observations, conveyed in a manner of peculiar force, and often in language of great novelty and appropriateness; in fine, in a style not entirely Mr. Bentham's, but in his best manner, with the exception of his Essay on Usury, and his Fragments on Government."—Hoffman's Legal Study.

"Mr. Bentham has particularly and philosophically examined the subject of punishment. His writings have been and will be of great practical benefit to mankind. They will form the mine wherein statesmen are to work for the ore that must be converted to the uses of Legislation. In practical legislation, in the laborious, and, what to most men would be, the tedious, scrutiny of existing abuses, in the unwearied exposure of inconsistency in our laws, and a daring without check, and before him without precedent, in sifting their very foundations, and penetrating the most awful and mysterious recesses of the temple of Justice, he stands perhaps without a rival among men."—Lon. Eclectic Review.

This treatise was trans. into English, under the following titles; The Rationale of Reward, Lon., 1825, 8vo. The Rationale of Punishment, Lon., 1829, 8vo.

On the Law of Evidence, 1813. Church of Englandism and its Catechism examined, 1818. Essai sur la Tactique des Assemblées Politiques, par Dumont, 1816. Swear not at all, &c., printed 1813, pub. 1817. Chrestomathia, 1817. Codification Proposal, 1822. Traité des Preuves Judiciaires, par Dumont, Paris, 1823. M. Dumont tells us that this Treatise cost the author more labour than any other of his works. The editor reduced to shape a mass of materials which had been accumulating for a long period. Trans. into English, Lon., 1825, 8vo. The Book of Fallacies from his unfinished papers, by a Friend, appeared in 1824. Rationale of Judicial Evidence, specially applied to English, by Mr. Mill, from the author's MSS., 5 vols. 8vo, 1827.

"We could have wished the present editor had translated the work out of the obscure involuted Benthamic dialect in which it is written. A book more disgustingly affected, and so nearly unintelligible, it is not possible to produce in the English language. It is a vast and most luxuriant forest of disquisition and information; a production which has occupied a powerful, original, and active mind, with little interruption, during a long and studious life."—American Southern Review.

We have not thought it necessary, in our limited space, to give the titles of all the publications of this voluminous author. Among the last pieces of the two years preceding his death were, The 1st vol. of a Constitutional Code; Official Aptitude Maximized; Expense Minimized; Justice and Codification Petitions; Letter to his French Fellow-Citizens; Letter to the French Chamber of Peers, and Remarks on the Bankruptcy Bill. An edition of his works has been pub. in 11 vols. 8vo, Edin., 1843, edited by Dr. Bowring, with an introduction by J. H. Burton, Esq. We shall now proceed to give some opinions on our celebrated author and his productions. We make a brief extract from Brissot's celebrated sketch:

"Candour in the countenance, mildness in the looks, serenity upon the brow, calmness in the language, coolness in the movements, imperturbability united with the keenest feeling; such are his qualities. . . . When he had examined all these wrecks of Gothic Law, and collected his materials, he applied himself to the construction of a systematic plan of civil and criminal law, founded entirely upon reason, and having for its object the happiness of the human race."

Dr. Parr, a small man with a great name—a man ridiculously overrated—perhaps overpraises Bentham as much as Bishop Butler overpraises Parr:

"Dr. Parr considered Jeremy Bentham as the wisest man of his time, whose powerful and penetrating mind had anticipated the improvements of coming ages, and who, on the all-important subject of Jurisprudence has discovered and collected knowledge, which will scarcely find its way to the great mass of human intellect, perhaps through the course of another century."—Field's Life of Parr, vol. ii., p. 203.

"In Jeremy Bentham the world has lost the great teacher and patriot of his time; the man who, of all men who were living on the day of his death, has exercised and is exercising over the fortunes of mankind the widest and most durable influence. . . . There are some most important branches of the science of law which were in a more wretched state than almost any of the others when he took them in hand, and which he has so exhausted, that he seems to have left nothing to be sought by future inquirers: we mean the departments of procedure, evidence, and the judicial establishment."—London Examiner.

The Traité de Législation Civile et Pénale was reviewed at length by Lord Jeffrey in the Edinburgh Review:

"The plan which Mr. Bentham has chalked out for himself in this undertaking, is more vast and comprehensive, we believe, than was ever ventured upon before by the ambition of any one individual. It embraces almost every thing that is important in the science of human nature, and not only touches upon all the higher questions of government and legislation, but includes most of the abstract principles of ethics and metaphysics, and professes to delineate those important rules by which the finest speculations of philosophy may be made to exert their influence on the actual condition of society. . . . Notwithstanding all that M. Dumont has done to render the work popular, we are afraid that it will have fewer readers than it deserves. Those who do read it, will also dissent, we should imagine, from many of the author's fundamental principles; but they will infallibly be delighted with the sagacity and independence which distinguish all his speculations, and will look forward with impatience to the publication of his entire system."—Vol. II., 1804.

The reviewing of the Book of Fallacies, (pub. 1824,) fell to the lot of the witty author of Peter Plymley's Letters. We commend the critique to the attention of our readers. Sydney Smith introduces the subject in his own amusing style:

"Whether it is necessary there should be a middleman between the cultivator and possessor, learned economists doubted; but neither gods, men, nor booksellers can doubt the necessity of a middleman between Mr. Bentham and the public. Mr. Bentham is long; Mr. Bentham is occasionally involved and obscure; Mr.

Bentham invents new and alarming expressions; Mr. Bentham loves division and subdivision—and he loves method itself, more than its consequences. Those only, therefore, who know his originality, his knowledge, his vigour, and his boldness, will recur to the works themselves. The great mass of readers will not purchase improvement at so dear a rate; but will choose rather to become acquainted with Mr. Bentham through the Reviews—after that eminent philosopher has been washed, trimmed, shaved, and forced into clean linen.”—Edin. Review, vol. xlii, 1825.

In the Papers relative to Codification were included the author's correspondence with divers constituted authorities in the United States of America, relative to the improvement of their legislation:

“The United States are still subject to the common law of England, except so far as that law has been altered or repealed by British or American statutes. In the opinion of Mr. Bentham, an unwritten law must always be attended with great evils; and he earnestly exhorts the Americans, in the place of it, to substitute a written code. The greater part of what is addressed on this subject to America is immediately applicable to England; and a matter of greater or more increasing importance can hardly be presented to our view. . . . What principally obstructs the circulation of Mr. Bentham's writings, is the style in which they are composed. Unlike most authors, Mr. Bentham's first publications are, in point of writing, the most perfect; and long habit and frequent exercise, instead of improving his language, seem only to have rendered it perplexed, obscure, and uncouth.”—Edin. Review, vol. xxix., 1817.

The Rationale of Judicial Evidence, (pub. 1827,) is very freely reviewed in the same periodical. The critic thus concludes:

“As we have spoken plainly our real sentiments regarding the flaws which strike across this great work a vein no deep and coarse that there is scarce a page together which we have read with unmingled pleasure; we are bound to state with equal sincerity, that we should have thought it impossible for any book upon a subject with which we had fancied ourselves well acquainted, and which, in our idiomatic form of it at least, we had been long conversant, to have given us so many new ideas, and to have so completely changed our old ones.”—Ibid., vol. xlviii, 1828.

The Théorie des Peines et des Récompenses, (pub. 1811,) affords an opportunity for honourable mention of the author: “Additional time for meditating upon the subject has only confirmed the conviction originally entertained, of the essential services rendered to the most important branch of legislation by this promulgation of Mr. Bentham's doctrines.”—Ibid., vol. xxii, 1813.

In a notice of Deontology, or the Science of Morality, arranged by Dr. Bowring from the MSS. of Mr. Bentham, (pub. 1834,) the Edinburgh reviewer remarks,

“That the Germans, the most accurate, learned, and philosophical nation in Europe, admit the merits of Mr. Bentham as a jurist, in his analysis and classification of the material interests of life; but their metaphysicians and moralists agree, we believe, without an exception, in considering his speculative philosophy as undeserving even the pomp and ceremony of an argument.”—Vol. lxi, 1835.

With respect to adverse criticism, Mr. Bentham pursued a plan the adoption of which would save many poor authors much mortification and chagrin; he made it a rule to read nothing against his theories.

Church of Englandism and its Catechism examined, (pub. 1818,) is severely rebuked in the Lon. Quarterly Review:

“It is fortunate that this book (as we have said) is not at all attractive; it is too obscure to be generally understood, and too ridiculous to be admired; and however mischievous the intention, the tendency will be very innocuous. Of its worst part, the indecent levity with which all that is sacred is treated in it, we have not spoken. These offences must be answered for at a higher tribunal; but we would seriously recommend it to the author to consider whether the decline of life cannot be better spent than in capriciously cavilling at the doctrines of religion, and in profane ridicule of its most holy rites.”—Vol. xxi, 1819.

Rev. H. J. Rose pub. A Critical Examination of those parts of Bentham's work which relate to the Sacraments and Church Catechism, Lon., 1819, 8vo.

A notice of Chrestomathia, a work upon education, &c., (pub. 1817,) will be found in the Monthly Review, vol. xc., 1819:

“In the present treatise, as in all the works of Mr. Bentham, the reader will discover much originality of thought; for the author never sits down to examine any of the objects of intellectual pursuit without illuminating them by the rays of his own enlightened understanding. Mr. Bentham has long been a daring innovator in the use of words; and he scatters his new terms over his page (thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks in Valambrom.)”

Bentham's Theory of Legislation translated into English by R. Hildreth, (see ante), was reviewed by Mr. W. Phillips in the North American Review, vol. li., 384:

“Mr. Bentham's political speculations are not without theoretical distortions; but he is not very Utopian, he does not write of perfect commonwealths, founded upon a state of manners, morals, and intelligence, of rights and obligations, that have been out of vogue ever since the golden age. He takes mankind as he finds them, with their passions, views, depravity, and blind prejudices; and sometimes reminds his readers of Solon's modification of theories and principles, by the rule, that you are only to give a people as good a code as they will bear.”

The author of the letters addressed to Sir Robert Peel under the signature of Eunomus handles Bentham with great severity; whilst, on the other hand, Mr. E. Sinclair Cullen declares that when he reads the criticisms of those who—

“Bounded by nature, narrowed still by art,
A trifling head, and a contracted heart,”— attack the opinions and deride the style of Mr. Bentham, I am the more struck with his stupendous superiority of mind, and his enviable superiority of feeling. . . . But I let my pen drop with humility;—suddenly ashamed at my presumption in fancying that I can offer any worthy homage to a person so celebrated in all quarters of the world as a benefactor to mankind.”

In a similar strain, a writer in the New Monthly Magazine does not scruple to say that “a knowledge of his works is a key which unlocks all the mysteries of social and political government.” The advocacy of Mr. Mill and the strictures of Sir Samuel Romilly, Sir James Mackintosh, and Mr. Macaulay need only be referred to here. Our utilitarian philosopher was not considered unworthy the adulation of princes. Talleyrand made a proposal a few weeks before the author's death to have a complete edition of his works published at Paris in the French language. The Emperor Alexander sent him a diamond ring, which, as Major Parry thinks, to his “immortal honour,” but as we think, rather in bad taste, he returned.

In the words of Sir James Mackintosh,
“It cannot be denied without injustice and ingratitude, that Mr. Bentham has done more than any other writer to rouse the spirit of juridical reformation which is now gradually examining every part of law; and when further progress is facilitated by digesting the present laws, will doubtless proceed to the improvement of all. Greater praise it is given to few to earn.”—Frd. Dis. to Encyc. Brit.

Had the philosopher been more distrustful of himself, he would have proved of more benefit to others, and a greater share of humility would have added to his true greatness.

Bentley, Richard, D.D., 1661-2-1742, was a native of Oulton, near Wakefield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. In 1676 he was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he gave such proofs of application to his studies, that at the early age of twenty he was nominated by the Fellows of St. John's to the head-mastership of the grammar school of Spalding, in Lincolnshire. After holding this situation for a twelvemonth, he accepted the office of domestic tutor to the son of Dr. Edward Stillingfleet, the Dean of St. Paul's, and subsequently Bishop of Worcester. In 1692 he received a prebend in Worcester Cathedral, and was appointed to deliver the first series of the Boyle Lectures. In the next year he was made keeper of the Royal Library at St. James's. In 1695 he was made chaplain in ordinary to the King; and took his degree of D.D. at Cambridge, in 1696. In February, 1700, he was installed master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and in the same year was collated to the archdeaconry of Ely, vacant by the death of Dr. Saywell. In 1717, by the death of Dr. James, the Regius Professorship of Divinity became vacant, and was obtained by Dr. Bentley by the use of the most skilful management. Our space will not permit us to enter into any detailed account of the unhappy controversies in which the master of Trinity bore so prominent a part. His demand for an illegal fee was resisted by Conyers Middleton, who was sustained by the Vice-chancellor's court. Bentley treated the authorities with the same contempt which he had displayed for his accuser; and on his refusal to make reparation, the senate, by a large majority, deprived him of all his degrees. This decree was followed by a lively controversy, in which Middleton displayed great ability. The Fellows of Trinity at last resolved to bring their grievances to a judicial tribunal. The cause was finally referred to the House of Lords, who commissioned Dr. Greene, the Bishop of Ely, to try Dr. Bentley upon twenty out of the sixty-four articles exhibited against him. The Bishop sentenced him to be deprived of his mastership, and his enemies seemed to have completely triumphed. But Bentley was not easily outwitted. The sentence of the Bishop could be put in execution by none but the vice-master; Bentley placed his devoted adherent, Richard Walker, in that office; and the new incumbent, pleading that he was not the same vice-master, refused to carry the sentence into execution. In 1738 Bishop Greene died; the proceedings were not revived, and Bentley triumphed; holding out for 28 years against all right and law, despising alike ecclesiastical authority, and the censure of the university. We will now turn to a more pleasing subject—the literary character of this great scholar and eminent classical critic.

His first publication was Epistola ad clarum virum Joannem Millium, appended to the Oxford edition of the Chronicle of Joannes Malelas Antiochenus. This dissertation at once established his reputation throughout Europe as “a critic of the very highest order of excellence.” It was received with the “loudest commendations by Grævius and Ezekiel Spanheim; and has ever since been spoken of by the first critics with reverence and wonder. See, in particular, Ruhnken’s preface to Alberti Hesychius.”

“There is, perhaps, no learned work of the same compass which can be compared with it for ingenuity, originality, and copious erudition. The observations on Hesychius are particularly valuable.”

“When we consider the number of topics discussed—of which many were among the most obscure and intricate within the whole range of philological criticism,—the reach and originality of his speculations on questions supposed to have been exhausted by the learning and sagacity of his predecessors,—the prodigious display of erudition, apparently not less extensive, and incomparably more accurate than that of Salmassius, Scaliger, or Casaubon—the close, irresistible logic with which he supports all his discoveries and conclusions,—and the animation of his style, which throws a charm and liveliness over subjects naturally the most devoid of interest, we may safely pronounce the Epistle to Dr. Mill to be one of the most extraordinary performances in the entire compass of classical literature. Indeed, but for one of the subsequent productions of the same author, it would have remained to this day unrivalled.”—Cunningham’s Biog. Hist.

Mr. Hallam, after remarking that Bentley was the greatest English critic in his own, or possibly any other, age, proceeds to notice the Epistle to Mill:

“In a desultory and almost garrulous strain Bentley pours forth an immense store of novel learning and of acute criticism, especially on his favourite subject, which was destined to become his glory, the scattered relics of the ancient dramatists. The style of Bentley, always terse and lively, sometimes humorous and dryly sarcastic, whether he wrote in Latin or in English, could not but augment the admiration which his learning challenged. Grævius and Spanheim pronounced him the rising star of British literature, and a correspondence with the former began in 1692, which continued in unbroken friendship till his death.”—Id. of Europe.

In 1696 he transmitted to Grævius his notes and emendations on Callimachus, with a large collection of the fragments of that poet.

“The erudition and critical acumen displayed in these contributions to his friend’s edition, were such as fully to sustain his reputation as the first scholar of modern times.”

The celebrated controversy respecting the genuineness of the Epistles of Phalaris now claims our attention. Sir William Temple had cited the Epistles of Phalaris and the Fables of Æsop as conspicuous instances of the superiority of ancient literature over modern. Wotton replied with ability; and Bentley promised to prove that the Æsopian Fables were not Æsop’s, and that the Epistles of Phalaris were a modern forgery. A new edition of the Epistles was preparing about this time at Christ Church College, Oxford, and the Honourable Charles Boyle, a student in the college, was selected as the editor. The preface to the new edition contained a censure upon Bentley for a supposed want of courtesy respecting the use of a MS. in the library at St. James’s. The bookseller, Bennet, had attempted to cover his negligence by throwing the blame upon Dr. Bentley, the librarian. The latter wrote to Mr. Boyle, and explained the facts of the case. Boyle replied, that “What Mr. Bentley had said might be true, but that the bookseller had represented the matter quite otherwise, and that Mr. Bentley might seek his redress in any method he pleased.”

In 1697 Wotton published a new edition of his Reply to Sir William Temple, and begged his friend Bentley to fulfil his promise, and furnish him with the proof of the spuriousness of the Epistles to Phalaris, the Fables of Æsop, and the Letters of Themistocles, of Socrates, and of Euripides. Dr. Bentley complied with the request, and composed a masterly demonstration of the position which he had so boldly assumed.

“Considered as a whole, the dissertation must be pronounced a masterpiece of learning and ability, to the production of which no other writer of the age was equal.”

The scholars of Christ Church, amazed but not silenced, determined to encounter their formidable opponent, and deputed a committee, consisting of Aterbury, Smalridge, Anthony Alsop, and the two brothers Freind, to carry on the war. Aterbury, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, was the principal champion. The rejoinder appeared in March, 1698. It was styled Dr. Bentley’s Dissertations on the Epistles of Phalaris and the Fables of Æsop, examined by the Hon. Charles Boyle. This work was as contemptible in point of philological learning as it was brilliant in the more popular qualities of wit and satire.

“It was received by the literary world with a tempest of applause. Wits and wittings, poets, mathematicians, and antiquaries concurred in celebrating the imaginary triumph of the Oxonians, and persecuting the great critic who was soon to crush them at a blow.”

Pope, Swift, Aldrich, Garth, Dodwell, and Conyers Middleton were among his opponents. Dr. Garth has stereotyped his own ignorance in the well-known couplet in his Dispensary:

“So diamonds owe a lustre to their foil,
And to a Bentley ’tis we owe a Boyle.”

Swift’s Battle of the Books is about the only one of all the satires aimed at Bentley which is now known to the general reader. But the triumphing of the Pigmies was short. In 1699 the doctor carried dismay into the ranks of the adversary by the “unrivalled and immortal” Dissertation upon the Epistles of Phalaris, with an Answer to the objections of the Hon. Robt. Boyle. The victory was complete: the enemy was made to “bite the dust,” and the battle was at an end.

“To those who never critically examined this truly stupendous production, it is impossible to convey an adequate conception of its merits. To affirm that it vindicates the character of Bentley in every particular on which it had been assailed, and, with one inconsiderable exception, sustains every position that he had advanced in the original dissertation upon Phalaris, is saying little. It is replete throughout with learning of the finest and rarest quality. The same unequalled force and subtlety of intellect which had distinguished the appendix to the Chronicle of Malelas, is here exhibited to even greater advantage. The style, though wanting in harmony and elegance, is full of energy; and the wit and sarcasm with which the whole piece abounds, if inferior to that of his adversaries in the qualities of ease and grace, is equal, perhaps superior, in pungency. This incomparable work was, after an interval of nearly eighty years, translated into Latin by Lennep, a scholar of eminence, and one of the pupils of the illustrious Valckenaar.”—Cunningham’s Biog. Hist.

“It may be said, with perfect truth, that, as a combination of profound learning and great originality with lively wit and sound logic, it has never been paralleled. Although it came forth as an occasional and controversial work, such is the fulness with which every subject in it is discussed, that it is still used as a text-book in our universities, and will always continue to be read even by those who have no interest in, nor acquaintance with, the book to which it is professedly an answer.”—Roe’s Biog. Dict.

We have quoted Mr. Hallam’s observations on the Epistle to Mill. This eminent authority proceeds to remark:

“But the rare qualities of Bentley were more abundantly displayed, and before the eyes of a more numerous tribunal, in his famous dissertation on the epistles ascribed to Phalaris. . . . It was the first great literary war that had been waged in England; and like that of Troy, it has still the prerogative of being remembered, after the Epistles of Phalaris are almost as much buried as the walls of Troy itself. Both combatants were skilful in wielding the sword: the arms of Boyle, in Swift’s language, were given him by all the gods; but his antagonist stood forward in no such figurative strength, master of a learning to which nothing parallel had been known in England, and that directed by an understanding prompt, discriminating, not idly skeptical, but still further removed from trust in authority; sagacious in perceiving corruptions of language, and ingenious, at the least, in removing them; with a style rapid, concise, amusing, and superior to Boyle in that which he had chiefly to boast, a sarcastic wit.”—Id. of Europe.

Mr. Disraeli, in his Quarrels of Authors, remarks:

“Bentley’s Dissertation on Phalaris is a volume of perpetual value to the lovers of ancient literature. His narrative of the rise of his controversy with Boyle is a most vigorous production; it heaves with the workings of a master spirit; still reasoning with such force, and still applying with such happiness the stores of his copious literature, that had it not been for this Literary Quarrel, the mere English reader had lost this single opportunity of surveying that commanding intellect. Posterity justly appreciates the volume of Bentley for its stores of Ancient Literature, and the author for that peculiar sagacity in emending a corrupt text, which formed his distinguishing characteristic as a classical critic.”

The Rev. Mr. Dyce, the learned editor of Bentley’s works, (Lon., 1836–38, 3 vols. only published), observes that

“On Bentley’s memorable performances, the Dissertations on Phalaris, criticism has been exhausted. In the just arrangement of the matter, in the logical precision of the arguments, and in the readiness and skill with which the most extensive and refined erudition is brought to bear upon the points contested, it is perhaps unrivalled by any single work. Enriched with incidental disquisitions on many different topics of classical learning, it will ever be prized by the student as a storehouse of important information."

"Good sense," says Bishop Warburton, "is the foundation of criticism; this it is that has made Dr. Bentley and Bishop Hare the two greatest critics that ever were in the world. Not that good sense alone will be sufficient; for that considerable part of it, amending a corrupt text, there must be a certain sagacity, which is so distinguishing a quality in Dr. Bentley."—Bishop Warburton to Dr. Birch: Nichols's Literary Anecdotes.

In 1708 Bentley addressed to Ludolph Kuster, who was engaged upon an edition of Aristophanes, Three Critical Epistles, containing annotations upon the Plutus and the Nubes. In the next year he communicated a number of notes to Davies's edition of the Tusculan Questions of Cicero. These were followed by the celebrated Emendations of Menander Philemon. How severely he rebuked the presumption of Le Clerc, and the controversy which ensued thereon, are matters doubtless familiar to many of our readers. His edition of Horace, which had engaged him for ten years, was published at Cambridge in 1711, 4to. This work claims both praise and censure. The illustrative annotations, and many of the emendations, are invaluable; the chronology has been approved as sound, and the logical acuteness and penetrating sagacity of the editor cannot be sufficiently admired; but, on the other hand, indefensible liberties are taken with the text, and a conjectural fabric of unwieldy proportions is erected upon a narrow basis of probability. The errors of so eminent a critic were not allowed to pass without chastisement. Ker and Johnson, and long afterwards, Cunningham, in his rival edition of Horace, (1721,) visited the offences of the great master with a rod of iron. In 1713, under the signature of Phileleutheros Lipsiensis, our author castigated Anthony Collins for his Discourse of Free-thinking, pub. in the same year.

"This volume should be studied by every man who is desirous of forming just notions of Biblical Criticism."—HENRY MARSH.

His great sermon on Popery was preached and published in 1715. Some Remarks upon it were pub. by John Cuming in 1718. In 1720 he issued his Proposals for printing a New Edition of the Greek Testament. His letter to Archbishop Wake upon this subject was dated four years earlier. Bentley designed to restore the text of the Greek Testament to the same state in which it was at the Council of Nice. His plan was "to amend the Greek text through the Latin Vulgate, in the same way as the version of Plato by M. Ticino is made the basis for corrections of the Greek text of that philosopher." The 22d chapter of the Apocalypse was published with the prospectus as a specimen; a number of MSS. had been collected, and £2000 subscribed. The Proposals were assailed by Conyers Middleton in a tone of great severity. Bentley replied to the attack—for which he held Dr. Colbatch partly responsible—but he did not carry out his projected new edition. Whether he would have fallen into the errors apprehended by Ernesti, of attaching too great weight to those Greek MSS. which have been interpolated from the Latin version, and to those Latin MSS. which he supposed to contain the genuine version of Jerome, which certainly followed the text of Origen—it is of course impossible to decide. Ernesti draws these conclusions from Bentley's proposals, but what scholar does not improve—and sometimes completely alter—the original design? It is proper to remark here, in connexion with the reference to Middleton, that in 1724 Bentley was restored by a peremptory mandamus to all the degrees and privileges of which he had been deprived.

In 1725 appeared his celebrated edition of Terence. This is carefully prepared, and will bear the test of criticism.

"The Schedasma on Latin metres which is prefixed to it, is still the best treatise on the subject. Indeed Bentley may be considered as absolutely a discoverer in relation to Latin metres: he had given a proof of his originality in this field in 1709. In some notes on Cicero's Tusculan Disputations appended to Davies's edition, in which he had restored, in a most ingenious and satisfactory manner, the fragments of the Latin poets quoted in that work."

Unfortunately this creditable work was followed by an edition of Phædrus and Publius Syrius, which has the unenviable distinction of being the most careless and indefensible production ever published by its editor. For his unwarrantable alterations of the text, and other faults, Dr. Hare, whom Bentley designed to, and did, anticipate, as editor to Phædrus, rebuked him severely in his Epistola Critica. Passing over for the moment a review of Bentley's revision of Paradise Lost, we briefly notice a labour for which the critic was much better qualified—his design to restore the text of Homer to the state in which it had been left by the ancient rhapsodists.

"This he intended to effect principally by the revival and insertion of an old letter, originally the sixth of the Greek alphabet, which, as the exigencies of the metre showed, must have been in use at the time when the Homeric poems were composed. This letter, which is commonly called the digamma, has a significance even for the readers of our lighter literature. Most persons are familiar with the lines which Pope, in the fourth book of his Dunciad, puts into the mouth of Bentley:

'Roman and Greek grammarian, know your better,—
Author of something yet more great than letter;
While towering o'er your alphabet, like Saul,
Stands our digamma, and o'ertops them all.'

"The last line refers to the representation of the digamma by a capital F, in two quotations from Homer which appeared in the notes to Milton." See the excellent article on Bentley in Rose's Biog. Diet.; also see Cunningham's Biog. Hist.

Bentley had now reached the ripe age of seventy-two, when he was arrested in his labours upon Homer by a paralytic stroke, which preceded his death about three years. The corrections in his copy of the poet were used by Heyne in his edition of Homer, and many of the eminent critic's suggestions have been printed by Mr. Donaldson in the New Cratylus. His last employment was an edition of Manilius, pub. in 1739 by his nephew, Richard Bentley. We made a passing reference to our author's proposed emendations to the text of Milton. For this delicate, and, indeed, supererogatory, task, few men of learning were less qualified. In those most essential points, a knowledge of the Italian and romantic writers, religious sensibility, and a fervid imagination, he was remarkably deficient. Even the command of Queen Caroline is no excuse for such an undertaking. Bentley should have declined in Latin, and, if still pressed, expostulated in Greek, and the business would have dropped. When Adam Smith remarked upon Johnson's recitation of Bentley's verses in Dodsley's Collection, that they were "very well! very well," Johnson replied, with his usual acuteness, "Yes, they are very well, sir; but you may observe in what manner they are well. They are the forcible verses of a man of strong mind, but not accustomed to write verse; for there is some uncouthness in the expression." The application to our subject is obvious. Fenton had dropped a hint that some apparent errors in Paradise Lost were probably occasioned by the carelessness or misapprehension of the amanuensis who wrote what the bard dictated. This conjecture is adopted by Bentley, and the unlucky amanuensis is not spared. We have already far exceeded our intended limits, and can devote but little space to a very amusing and very instructive subject. Bentley's improvements of Milton must be read to be appreciated. It is possible that some one of our readers may not have met with the correction of the grand line:

"No light, but rather darkness visible."

Bentley kindly offers us the following:

"No light, but rather a transpicuous gloom."

Which does the reader prefer?

"As from the centre thrice to the utmost pole," is "amended" to

"Distance which to express all measure fails."

"Our torments, also, may in length of time

Become our elements," is changed to

"Then, as 'twas well observed, our torments may Become our elements."

See an amusing chapter upon this subject in Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature. We subjoin the following epigram on Bentley's editorial labours:

"ON MILTON'S EXECUTIONER.

DID MILTON'S PROSE, O CHARLES! thy death defend?

A furious foe, unconscious proves a friend;

ON MILTON'S VERSE does BENTLEY comment! know

A weak officious friend becomes a foe.

While he would seem his author's fame to further,

The MURDEROUS CRITIC has avenged THE MURDER."

But a warrior who had gained so many battles on his own element could well afford an occasional shipwreck, when, like Pyrrho, he chose "To sail upon a sea of speculation."

Whether the laudation be extravagant or not, he must have great merits of whom the critic dares to say

"He stands undoubtedly the very first among all the philological critics of every age and nation, in 'shape and gesture proudly pre-eminent.' No single individual ever contributed so much to the actual stores of the learned world, or gave so strong an impulse to the study of the ancient classics."—Cunningham's Biog. Hist.

With reference to Bentley's position as a scholar when compared with the classical "giants of those days," it will be interesting to quote the verdicts of a few others, themselves more or less imbued with that love for the "wit and genius of the heathen," which the great master of Trinity acknowledged had "beguiled him."

Bishop Monk, his learned biographer, styles him "the most celebrated scholar of modern times."

Mr. De Quincey makes an exception.

"We should pronounce him the greatest of scholars were it not that we remember Salmasius. Dr. Parr was in the habit of comparing the Phalaris dissertation with that of Salmasius De Lingua Hellenistica. For our own part, we have always compared it with the same writer's Plinian Excerptiones. Both are among the miracles of human talent, but with this difference, that the Salmasian work is crowded with errors; whilst that of Bentley, in its final state, is absolutely without spot or blemish."—Blackwood's Mag., 1830; repub. in Philos. Writers.

Edward Everett, a ripe Hellenist, as his call to the Professorship of the Greek language and literature in Harvard College, before he was of age, may indicate, whilst allowing that "Richard Bentley is the greatest classical scholar ever produced by England," proceeds to remark that

"Whether his name could be safely placed above that of Erasmus, Scaliger, and Hemsterhuys, not to mention any of the renowned scholars of the last generation, may be a question on which the learned of England and other countries might differ. But this we think may be safely said, that if Bentley, in all other things the same, had passed his life in the quiet of a University in Holland or Germany;—if he had redeemed to those studies for which he was born, the time and the talents which he wasted in the petty squabbles of his college mastership, he would unquestionably have made himself, beyond all rivalry, the most celebrated scholar of modern times."—North American Review, vol. xiii. 468.

But what Mr. Everett is willing to admit Bentley might have become under more favourable circumstances, Bishop Monk insists he really was; and not satisfied with the eulogy we have just quoted, he carries what some will deem extravagance to what many will pronounce absurdity, by declaring that "Notwithstanding his frequent abuse of his erudition, such is the power of genius, and so great the preponderance of his solid and unshaken merits, that Bentley has established a school of criticism, of which the greatest scholars since his time have been proud to consider themselves members; and, in spite of the envy and opposition of his contemporaries, has attained a more exalted reputation than has hitherto been the lot of any one, in the department of ancient literature."

The biographer's episcopal brother, Bishop Lowth, accords to Bentley no small praise in declaring him to have been "the greatest critic and most able grammarian of the last age," and Bishop Marsh, also, pronounces him to have been "the most acute critic not only of this nation, but of all Europe."

The acknowledgments of Heyne, who enjoyed the great advantage of the use of Bentley's annotated Iliad, when preparing his own edition, are freely expressed. The following "praise" is "faint" to absurdity:

"Though a daring and sometimes a speculative, emendator, he was, perhaps, one of the first classical critics that has yet appeared in this country."—Lon. Monthly Review, vol. cxiii.

"One of the first, and 'perhaps' only, not certainly even, one of the first!"

This is indeed the "Nil admirari" to excess! What "Daniel" have we here?

A writer in the Lon. Quarterly Review draws a comparison between Bentley and Porson:

"Bentley's memory, according to his own expression, was 'none of the best'; it was the unparalleled perfection of this faculty in Porson on which his superiority relied. It gave him the complete and instant command of all his stores of erudition; he could bring to bear, at once, on any question, every passage from the whole range of Greek literature which could elucidate it. [This is hyperbole, even to nonsense; a university full of Bentleys and Porsons could not perform such a feat.] He could approximate, on the instant, the slightest coincidence in thought or expression, and the accuracy was quite as surprising as the extent of the recollection. In another respect, no two characters could be more opposite than Bentley and Porson: the former, in his immeasurable self-confidence, bold, adventurous, decisive; the other, cool, sure, and cautious. In his scholarship, (would that he had been under as safe a guidance in all his habits!) Porson was singularly prudent; hence, though Bentley is more splendidly and originally right, Porson is more unerringly so; Bentley's judgments are more numerous, and on a greater variety, but all are not of equal authority. Porson's are few, but none of them have ever been reversed. Bentley's light was thrown about with greater profusion on many objects; Porson's was centered on a few, but burned more steadily on those. The same prudence kept Porson within the province in which his strength lay, that of philological criticism; he never ventured on the more debatable ground of the criticism of taste. In their style there was the same difference; the careless copiousness and natural vigour of Bentley was in the strongest contrast to the terseness and neatness of Porson's most finished writing; and the fine irony of the latter, of which we have some few examples, in the character of Gibbon for instance, is the opposite extreme to the coarse vehemence and the broader humour of Bentley's controversial tone."—Vol. xlv. 118.

As a preacher Bentley could not but occupy a high place in point of depth, and the power of exciting that interest which follows the guidance of a great intellect in the contemplation of the duties of time and the awful realities of eternity. For that style of exhortation which awakens the affections, and secures the convictions of the judgment by the impulses of the heart, the preacher was unequal. He enforced the truths of revelation by the teachings of nature, as expounded by her greatest interpreter, the immortal Newton. A sermon of Bentley's based upon a thesis of Newton's must have been an intellectual gratification not unworthy an angelic auditory. But we fear that in simply "vindicting the ways of God to man," but little would be done to reconcile the heart of man to God. Accurate, precise, and exhaustive he could not fail to be.

"Bentley is a model," says Bishop Horne, "for polemic preaching, on account of the conciseness, perspicuity, and fairness with which objections are stated; and the clear, full, and regular manner in which they are answered."—Essays and Thoughts.

"Religion was no less indebted to him than learning, for in 1691-92 he had the honour to be selected as the first person to preach at Boyle's Lectures, (founded by that great and honourable gentleman to assert and vindicate the great fundamentals of natural and revealed religion,) upon which occasion he successfully applied Sir Isaac Newton's Principia Mathematica to demonstrate the Being of God, and altogether silenced the Atheists, who, in this country, have since that time, for the most part, sheltered themselves under Deism. In those sermons he laid the basis and foundation upon which all the successors to that worthy office have since built. Though this was a task of great extent, and no small difficulty, yet Mr. Bentley (at this time only 30 years of age, and in deacon's orders) acquitted himself with so much reputation, that the trustees not only publicly thanked him for them, but did, moreover, by special command and desire, prevail upon him to make the said discourses public, upon which he gave to the world a volume, 1693, 4to, containing eight sermons, which have not only undergone a number of editions, but have been translated abroad into several languages."

"Incomparable, and well calculated to give a proper direction to a young man's mind in religious inquiry, and to guard him against infidelity."—Kerr.

We advise all of our readers to procure them; and, indeed, the three volumes of Rev. Alexander Dyce's editions of Bentley's works, Lon., 1836-38. We trust that this edition will yet be completed. The 3 vols. already published contain: Vols. I. and II., Dissertations upon the Epistles of Phalaris, Themistocles, Socrates, Euripides, and upon the Fables of Æsop, and Epistola ad J. Millium. Vol. III., Theological Works, viz.: Eight Sermons preached at Boyle's Lecture; Four Letters from Sir Isaac Newton to Dr. Bentley; Three Sermons on Various Subjects; Visitation Charge; Remarks upon a late Discourse of Free-Thinking; Proposals for printing a new edition of the Greek Testament, and St. Hierom's Latin Version; Oratiuncula.

"We are glad to see, at last, the works of the father of (and also the best of) our critics, published collectively, and we are surprised that it has not been done long ago. Every thing that Bentley wrote is excellent in its kind. No man was ever so acute and judicious in his criticism, so convincing and logical in his arguments, with such extensive and profound learning, as the writer of the Dissertations on the Epistles of Phalaris. We have carefully looked through these volumes, and can safely say, that Mr. Dyce is a good scholar, and a careful editor. Bentley could not have fallen into better hands."—London Literary Gazette.

The Life of Bentley by Dr. Monk, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, must not be overlooked by the reader. It was first pub. in 1830, 4to, pp. 668, Ap. 83, and since in 2 vols. 8vo. This work has been commended as a model for works of the kind. An abridgment of it will be found in Hartley Coleridge's Biographia Borealis.

"The life of Bentley, impartially and ably developed by Dr. Monk, involving in great measure the literary annals of the first half of last century, and the particular history of the University of Cambridge, was a desideratum which is now supplied in the most satisfactory manner; and a sterling work has been added to the stores of British biography."—London Literary Gazette.

To this invaluable work should be added The Correspondence of Dr. Bentley, edited by the Rev. Christopher Wordsworth, D.D., Canon of Westminster, Lon., 2 vols. 8vo, 1842. The reader may form some idea of the treasures contained in these volumes from the prospectus:

"This collection will consist of published and unpublished letters, arranged in chronological order, to and from Dr. Bentley, from the British Museum, the Lambeth, the Bodleian, and Christ Church Libraries; and from various books and several private sources; and especially from the Library and Archives of Trinity College, Cambridge, whence, among other materials, about a hundred inedited letters to Dr. Bentley from the Principal Continental Scholars of the 18th century have been supplied, by the permission of the Master and Scholars of the College, for this work."

It is proper to say that we owe the description of this collection of correspondence to Bentley's admirable biographer, Bishop Monk. His lordship transferred the duty to the late Rev. J. Wordsworth, and the brother of the latter took up the unfinished task as a fraternal legacy. Dr. Wordsworth takes occasion to enlarge eloquently upon the value of the Latin tongue as a medium of intercourse for learned scholars. He takes Kuster severely to task for adding a broken English P.S. to a Latin letter. Dr. W. opposes such barbarous innovations:

"When men of learning have ceased to possess a common lan guage, they will soon forget that they have a common country; they will no longer regard each other as intellectual compatriots; they will be Englishmen, Frenchmen, Dutchmen, but not scholars."

The classical scholar will find at the British Museum a large collection of tracts written by and against Bentley.

In Mr. Richard Cumberland's Memoirs of his Own Life will be found many interesting particulars concerning his maternal grandfather, our illustrious critic. Mr. Cumberland tells us that his mother, the great man's daughter, expressed to him her regret that "He had bestowed so great a portion of his time and talents upon criticism, instead of employing them upon original composition. He acknowledged the justice of her regret with extreme sensibility, and remained for a considerable time thoughtful, and seemingly embarrassed by the nature of her remark; at last, recollecting himself, he said, 'Child, I am sensible I have not always turned my talents to the proper use for which I should presume they were given to me; yet I have done something for the honour of my God, and the edification of my fellow-creatures: but the wit and genius of those old heathens beguiled me; and as I despaired of raising myself up their standard upon fair ground, I thought the only chance I had of looking over their heads was to get upon their shoulders.'"

Bentley, Richard, d. 1782, only son of the preceding, was a man of considerable literary talent. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, resided for many years in the south of France, and for some time at Teddington, near Twickenham, in consequence of his intimacy with Horace Walpole.

"They carried on, for a long time, a sickly kind of friendship, which had its hot fits and cold fits, was suspended and renewed, but never totally broken."—R. CUMBERLAND; his nephew.

He was in great favour with Lord Bute, who gave him a place under government. He was author of Patriotism, a satirical poem attacking Wilkes and his friends, 1765. (See Dilly's Repository, vol. iv.) Poetical Epistle to Lord Melbourne, 1763. (St. James's Chronicle for April.) Philodamus, 1767. The Prophet, 1788. He was employed in the trans. of Hentzer's Account of England. His Comedy of the Wishes was performed in 1761.

"The turn of his genius did not seem greatly adapted to dramatic writing, by this specimen."—Biog. Dramat.

Bentley, Richard, grandson of the celebrated Richard Bentley, wrote Considerations on the State of Public Affairs at the beginning of 1796, Lon., 1796, 8vo; ditto, 1798, pub. 1798, 8vo.

Bentley, Thomas, nephew of the celebrated Richard Bentley, was of Trinity College, Cambridge. He pub. in 1713 an edition of Horace, which was the text of his uncle's edition, with reasons for rejecting the old, and substituting the new readings. In 1718 he printed an edit. of Cicero de Finib. et Paradoxa; and in 1741 an edit. of Callimachus, anon.: erroneously attributed by Davies to his uncle.

Bentley, William, 1758-1819, a minister in Salem, Massachusetts, was a native of Boston. He pub. some Sermons, &c., 1790-1807, and a History of Salem, in the 6th vol. of Historical Collections.

Denham, Lon., 1582, 3 vols. 4to. Another edition sine anno. Each of these Lamps has a distinct title-page. The first three Lamps form the 1st vol.; the fourth Lamp alone the 2d vol.; and the remaining three Lamps compose the 3d vol. The only perfect copy known was sold (Inglis Catalogue, 156) for £15.

Bently, Thomas. Five Letters to them that seek Peace with God, 1774, 8vo. Reason and Revelation; or, a Brief Answer to Paine's Age of Reason, Lon., 1794, 8vo.

Bently, William. Hallifax and its Gibbet-Law placed in a true Light, &c., Lon., 1708. Written by Dr. Saml. Midgley; pub. after his death by Bennet, who affixed his name to it as the author.

Bently, William, D.D. Sermons, 1735-38, 8vo.

Benton, Clark. Statement of Facts and Law, &c., Troy, 1804, 8vo.

Benton, Thomas Hart, 1782-1858, an American statesman, born at Hillsborough, N. Carolina, educated at Chapel Hill College, and removed in early life to Tennessee. In 1815 he settled in St. Louis and devoted himself to the practice of the law. He soon became a leading politician, and for thirty years represented the State of Missouri in the Senate of the U. States. 1. Thirty Years' View; or, A History of the Working of the American Government for Thirty Years, from 1820 to 1850. Vol. I, N. Y., 1854, 8vo; vol. II, N. Y., 1856, 8vo: 65,000 vols. of this work were sold as soon as published.

"The literary execution of this work, the simplicity of its style, and the unexceptionable taste which tempers all its author's allusions to his contemporaries, have been the subject of universal admiration."—W. C. BAYANT.

"Mr. Benton's opportunities as an actor and eye-witness give him great advantages in this species of historical memoir,—for such it is, neither exactly history nor biography. In his preface he quotes Macaulay, and justly claims the prestige of his experience in public affairs for his work. If Gibbon and Fox and Mackintosh wrote better for being Parliament men, Mr. Benton can set forth as well for his story the quorum magna pars fuit."—Churchman.

"In this work, even at the advanced age of seventy-six, his daily labors were almost incredible: it was finally completed down to the conclusion of the great compromise debate of 1850,—upon his very death-bed, where he dictated and revised the final portions in whispers, after he had lost the ability to speak aloud."—*Appleton's New Amer. "Col. Benton's eminent talent and reputation as a statesman, his familiar acquaintance with our parliamentary history, and his untiring industry, are a sufficient guarantee for the faithful execution of this great undertaking."—HON. EDWARD EVERETT.

In a strain of lively and ingenious railery he has detected the sources of Dr. Hurd's explanation of Virgil's invocation to Augustus, in the 3d Georgic, and he has shown that the discovery of which that learned critic assumed the merit, was nothing more than an obvious interpretation of the poet's words, which had been previously given by different commentators."—*Lon. Berenger, Richard, d. 1782, aged 62, for many years Gentleman of the Horse to George III., nephew of Lord Cobham and Lady Lyttelton, was a gentleman of considerable literary talent. Dr. Johnson named him as the standard of true elegance. He was the author of three "excellent papers" in The World, Nos. 79, 156, and 202; and some of his poems, "written with great ease and elegance," are in Dodsley's Collection. These were controversial, and in opposition to the views of Bishop Milner. The bishop pays Mr. B.'s style a high compliment:

"Mr. J. Berington possesses an enlivening pen, which will not suffer any subject that it touches to languish, or grow insipid. Amongst all the periods that have been objected to in his numerous compositions, no one ever objected to a dull period." See Lon. Gent. Mag., 1828, Pl. 1.

1210, in which the character of Thomas à Becket is vindicated from the attacks of George, Lord Lyttleton, Birm., 1790, 4to.

"This work is distinguished by industry of investigation, vigour of conception, vivacity and energy of expression, and, on the fundamental questions of civil polity, liberality of sentiment. We know few writers more capable of exhibiting facts with lively colouring, or of giving animation to his narrative by a free use of the dramatic style. The structure of his periods is agreeably varied, and his diction is elegant."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Memoirs of George Pansani, giving an account of his agency in England in the years 1634-35 and '36; translated from the Italian original, and now first published, etc., Lon., 1793, 8vo. This publication gave offence to many members of Mr. B.'s Church, and the Rev. Charles Plowden, a R. Catholic clergyman, pub. Remarks on Berington's work in 1784, in which Mr. P. questioned the authenticity of Pansani's Memoirs. The Faith of Catholics confirmed by Scripture, and attested by the Fathers of the first five Centuries of the Church, Lon., 1813, 8vo. (In conjunction with Dr. Kirk.) Mr. Berington thus proved his loyalty to his Church, though bold enough to condemn what he esteemed the erroneous views of some of her members. An attempt to deceive the Italian populace by pretended miracles, under the French Invasion, was rebuked by our author in his Examination of Events termed Miraculous, as reported in Letters from Italy, Lon., 1796, 8vo. The work by which Mr. Berington is best known is his Literary History of the Middle Ages; comprehending an Account of the State of Learning from the Close of the Reign of Augustus to its Revival in the Fifteenth Century. With two Appendices, 1814, 4to. A new edit. of this work, with an index, was pub. by D. Bogue, Lon., 1846, 12mo.

"This book has merit. It is a pleasant succession of notices on the chief writers of the Continent, from the fall of the Roman empire downwards. It is written in a clear, popular manner, and it is everywhere pervaded by a candid spirit."—London Atheneum.

"We cannot characterise the work before us as very profound, either in research or in reflections."—Lon. Quar. Rev.

Berkeley, Edward. Mt. Vesuvius; Phil. Trans. 1707.

Berkeley, George, D.D., 1684-1753, Bishop of Cloyne, in Ireland, was one of the most eminent prelates and distinguished philosophers since the Reformation. He was a native of Kilerin, in the county of Kilkenny, and descended from an English family zealously attached to the cause of Charles I. He was admitted of Trinity College, Dublin, at the age of 15, and became a Fellow in 1707. In this year appeared his first publication, Arithmetica absque Algebra aut Euclide demonstrata. This book was written before he was twenty.

"This little piece is so far curious, as it shows his early and strong passion for the mathematics, his admiration of those great names in philosophy, Locke and Newton, some of whose positions he afterwards ventured to call in question, and the commencement of his application to those more subtle metaphysical studies to which his genius was particularly adapted."

In 1709 he established his reputation as a philosopher by An Essay towards a New Theory of Vision, Dub., 8vo.

"The first attempt that ever was made to distinguish the immediate and natural objects of sight, from the conclusions we have been accustomed from infancy to draw from them; a distinction from which the nature of vision hath received great light, and by which many phenomena in optics, before looked upon as unaccountable, have been clearly and distinctly resolved."—Dr. Reid's Inquiry into the Mind.

It will be observed that this treatise was given to the world when the philosopher was but 25 years of age. In 1733 he pub. A Vindication of this Theory. Refer to Bailey's Review of Berkeley's Theory of Vision, Lon., 1842. In the next year, 1710, he pub. his celebrated work, The Principles of Human Knowledge, Dublin, 8vo, and in 1713, Three Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous, &c.

"The object of both pieces is to prove that the commonly received notion of the existence of matter is false; that sensible material objects, as they are called, are not external to the mind, but exist in it, and are nothing more than impressions made upon it by the immediate act of God, according to certain rules termed laws of nature, from which, in the ordinary course of his government, he never deviates; and that the steady adherence of the Supreme Spirit to these rules is what constitutes the reality of things to his creatures."

It will not be expected that we should enter here into an extended examination of this theory. An isolated example, set up as a target for ridicule which all can appreciate and enjoy, is an easy mode of refutation, but not very philosophical. Lord Byron says

"When Bishop Berkeley proved there was no matter, He proved it was no matter what he said."

Boswell tells us that his "guide, philosopher, and friend," referred to this theory on several occasions:

"After we came out of church, we stood talking for some time together of Bishop Berkeley's ingenious sophistry to prove the non-existence of matter, and that every thing in the universe is simply ideal. I observed, that though we were satisfied his doctrine is not true, it is impossible to refute it. I never shall forget the alacrity with which Johnson answered, striking his fist with mighty force against a large stone, till he rebounded from it, 'I refute it thus.' This was a stout exemplification of the first truths of Père Bouffier, or the original principles of Reid and of Beattie; without admitting which we can no more argue in metaphysics, than we can argue in mathematics without axioms. To me it is not conceivable how Berkeley can be answered by pure reasoning; but I know that the nice and difficult task was to have been undertaken by one of the most luminous minds of the present age, [Edmund Burke,] had not politics 'turned him from calm philosophy aside.' What an admirable display of subtlety, united with brilliancy, might his contending with Berkeley have afforded us."

Again:

"Being in company with a gentleman who thought fit to maintain Dr. Berkeley's ingenious philosophy, that nothing exists but as perceived by some mind; when the gentleman was going away, Johnson said to him, 'Pray, sir, don't leave us; for we may perhaps forget to think of you, and then you will cease to exist.'"

On another occasion, the Doctor remarked:

"Berkeley was a profound scholar, as well as a man of fine imagination."

Undoubtedly the latter, if his theory was nothing but a creature of his imagination.

Dr. Beattie remarks that

"If Berkeley's argument be conclusive, it proves that to be false which every man must necessarily believe, every moment of his life, to be true, and that to be true which no man since the foundation of the world was ever capable of believing for a single moment."

This is putting the case strongly. Berkeley was as well aware of the existence of stones and tables as Dr. Johnson was. Although he considered his treatises to be contributions to the cause of revealed truth, some have construed them very differently.

"These works form the best lessons of skepticism which are to be found among the ancient or modern philosophers, Bayle not excepted."—DAVID HUME.

Even if this were true, the evidence of Revelation does not stand or fall with the hypothesis of any philosopher. Dr. Beattie also objects to the skeptical tendency of Berkeley's theory. His argument in favour of non-existence has been reduced to this syllogism:

Whatever is immediately perceived by sense is an idea. Sensible things are things immediately perceived by sense. Therefore sensible things are ideas, and consequently exist only in the mind.

This syllogism has not, the reader will perceive, the impregnability of a mental Gibraltar. The philosopher was not afraid to submit his proposition to the scrutiny of the metaphysicians and savants of the day. Mr. Whiston tells us,

"He published this metaphysic notion, that matter was not a real thing; nay, that the common opinion of its reality was groundless, if not ridiculous. He was pleased to send Dr. Clarke and myself, each of us, a book. After we had both perused it, I went to Dr. Clarke, and discoursed with him about it to this effect: that I, being not a metaphysician, was not able to answer Mr. Berkeley's subtle premises, though I did not at all believe his absurd conclusion. I therefore desired that he, who was deep in such subtilties, but did not appear to believe Mr. Berkeley's conclusions, would answer him: which task he declined."—Memoirs of Dr. Clarke.

Addison, many years after this, brought Berkeley and Clarke together, to give them an opportunity of arguing the matter out. The result may be anticipated. Berkeley "declared himself not well satisfied with the conduct of his antagonist on the occasion; who, though he could not answer, had not candour enough to own himself convinced;" and doubtless Clarke thought as hard of the non-materialist for not acknowledging himself completely beaten out of his absurd hypothesis. We are here reminded of a still more lively dispute which our philosopher had with the celebrated Father Malebranche. Berkeley travelled as tutor with the son of the Bishop of Clogher. Resident for some time in Paris, the good tutor, we may presume, was thoroughly disgusted with the frivolity and absence of speculative disposition exhibited by the thoughtless Parisians, who persisted in believing their eyes, and asserting the positive existence of the champagne and cogniac which they obstinately enjoyed, whilst Berkeley held himself ready to prove that there was no such thing as wine and brandy in the world. At last the good man, eager for a hearty round at metaphysical discussion, bethought himself of visiting the famous author of the Search after Truth, which Truth was exactly what Berkeley was prepared to give him. We are told that "He found this ingenious father in his cell, cooking in a small pipkin a medicine for a disorder with which he was then troubled, —inflammation of the lungs. The conversation naturally turned on our author's system, of which the other had received some knowledge from a translation just published. But the issue of this debate proved tragical to poor Malebranche. In the heat of disputation he raised his voice so high, and gave way so freely to the natural impetuosity of a man of parts and a Frenchman, that he brought on himself a violent increase of his disorder, which carried him off a few days after."

Mr. De Quincey, in his paper On Murder Considered as One of The Fine Arts, gives the following amusing version of this celebrated controversy:

"Malebranche, it will give you pleasure to hear, was murdered. The man who murdered him is well known: it was Bishop Berkeley. The story is familiar, though hitherto not put in a proper light. Berkeley when a young man went to Paris, and called on Père Malebranche. He found him in his cell cooking. Cooks have ever been a gens irritables; authors still more so: Malebranche was both: a dispute arose; the old father, warm already, became warmer; culinary and metaphysical irritation united to derange his liver: he took to his bed, and died. Such is the common version of the story: 'So the whole ear of Denmark is abused.' The fact is, that the matter was hushed up out of consideration for Berkeley, who (as Pope remarked) had 'every virtue under heaven': else it was well known that Berkeley, feeling himself nettled by the waspishness of the old Frenchman, squared at him; a far-up was the consequence: Malebranche was flogged in the first round; the conceit was wholly taken out of him; and he would perhaps have given in; but Berkeley's blood was now up, and he insisted on the old Frenchman's retracting his doctrine of Occasional Causes. The vanity of the man was too great for this, and he fell a sacrifice to the impetuosity of Irish youth, combined with his own absurd obstinacy."

In 1712 he pub. Three Sermons in favour of Passive Obedience and Non-resistance, on Rom. xiii. 2, 8vo, 3 editions. This doctrine did not recommend him to the new House of Hanover on the death of Queen Anne. In 1713 he visited London, where he became acquainted with Swift, Arbuthnot, Pope, Addison, and Steele. Steele had just commenced The Guardian, and secured Berkeley's contributions on the easy terms of one guinea and a dinner each. His papers are in defence of Christianity against Collins and some other thick-headed gentlemen of the day. In November, 1713, he accompanied the Earl of Peterborough's embassy to Sicily in the quality of chaplain and secretary. Whilst absent he became senior Fellow of his college, and in 1717 was created D.D. by diploma. He returned to England in 1714, and was attacked by a fever, for which Arbuthnot prescribed:

"Poor philosopher Berkeley has now the idea of health, which was very hard to produce in him; for he had an idea of a strange fever on him so strong, that it was very hard to destroy it by producing a contrary one."—Arbuthnot to Swift.

Despairing of preferment under the new government, he accepted an offer to travel on the continent with Mr. Ashe, son of the Bishop of Clogher. They were absent for four years, and returned to London in 1721, in which year he pub. An Essay towards preventing the Ruin of the Nation, in reference to the wild speculations engendered by the South Sea Scheme. In 1718 Mrs. Vanhomrigh (Swift's Vanessa) left Berkeley, as one of her executors, the sum of £4000, and to the other, Judge Marshall, the same amount; no doubt to the great disgust of Dean Swift. In 1724 Berkeley was promoted to the Deanery of Derry, with £1100 per annum, and resigned his Fellowship. In 1725 he pub. A Proposal for Converting the savage Americans to Christianity. To effect this purpose he was anxious to establish a college in the Bermudas, and exerted himself with so much diligence, that for this object he procured a parliamentary grant of £10,000, and several large private subscriptions. The queen offered him an early Bishopric if he would remain in England, but Berkeley declared that he should prefer the headship of St. Paul's College at Bermudas to the primacy of all England. A charter was granted for the erection of a college, to consist of a president and nine fellows, who were under the obligation to maintain and educate Indian scholars, at the rate of £10 per annum for each. Three junior fellows of Trinity College agreed to accompany him, and to relinquish their hopes of preferment at home, for £40 per annum, and the opportunity of extensive missionary usefulness. Berkeley, now in the tide of apparent success, gave vent to his feelings in the following ode:

"The muse, disgusted at an age and clime
Barren of every glorious theme,
In distant lands now waits a better time,
Producing subjects worthy fame."

In happy climes, where from the genial sun
And virgin earth such scenes ensue,
The force of art by nature seems outdone,
And fancied beauties by the true,—
In happy climes, the seat of Innocence,
Where nature guides, and virtue rules,
Where men shall not impose for truth and sense
The pedantry of courts and schools,—
There shall be sung another golden age,
The rise of empire and of arts,
The good and great inspiring epic rage,
The wisest heads and noblest hearts,
Not such as Europe breeds in her decay,
Such as she bred when fresh and young,
When heavenly flame did animate her clay,
By future poets shall be sung.
Westward the course of empire takes its way;
The four first acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day:
Time's noblest offspring is the last."

In 1728 he married Anne, the eldest daughter of Mr. Forster, speaker of the Irish House of Commons, and immediately after the ceremony he embarked for the western continent.

Of the dean's arrival in Newport, Rhode Island, we have an account in the New England Journal, which publishes a letter from a person from Newport:

"Yesterday arrived here Dean Berkeley, of Londonderry, in a pretty large ship. He is a gentleman of middle stature, of an agreeable, pleasant, and erect aspect. He was ushered into the town with a great number of gentlemen, to whom he behaved himself after a very complaisant manner. 'Tis said he proposes to tarry, with his family, about three months."

In Peterson's History of Rhode Island we are told that the pilot brought to Newport a letter from Berkeley to the clergyman, Mr. Honyman, and a statement that a great dignity of the Church of England, called a Dean, was on board the vessel, and that the letter was handed to Mr. Honyman, who was in the pulpit. He read it to the audience, and as it appeared that the dean might land at any moment, the congregation was dismissed forthwith, and all, clergyman, vestrymen, wardens, male and female, hurried down to the wharf to receive the great man with their benedictions and welcome. At Rhode Island Berkeley resided for nearly two years, preaching every Sunday at Newport when there, and diligently performing pastoral duty among the people. He waited in vain for a remittance of the promised funds to establish his college in what might be deemed a suitable location, but no money came. At last Bishop Gibson, at that time Bishop of London, (in whose diocese all the West Indies are included,) called upon Sir Robert Walpole, and begged to know whether the money would be forthcoming or not. "If you put this question to me as a minister," replied Sir Robert, "I must and can assure you, that the money shall most undoubtedly be paid as soon as suits with public convenience; but if you ask me as a friend whether Dean Berkeley should continue in America, expecting the payment of £10,000, I advise him by all means to return home to Europe, and to give up his present expectations." The advice of the miserable time-server, the Great Corrupter, was taken, and the good dean returned home. On the great day of account we would not bear Walpole's responsibility for worlds! To Yale College Berkeley presented 880 volumes; to Harvard Library valuable donations of Greek and Latin Classics, and his Whitehall estate of 100 acres to Yale and Harvard Colleges, for three scholarships in Latin and Greek. This endowment has become very valuable. The sojourner at the beautiful town of Newport will find inscribed on the organ in the venerable "Trinity Church" the inscription, "The gift of Bishop Berkeley."

In 1732 our author pub. A Sermon on John xviii. 3, and Aleiphron, or the Minute Philosopher, Lon., 8vo. This work, which is a defence of religion against the systems of the atheist, fatalist, and skeptic, in the form of a dialogue, on the model of Plato, was written in hours of leisure, whilst at Newport. Dr. Sherlock, afterwards Bishop of London, carried the work to Queen Caroline, whose admiration of the author was still further increased, and she procured for him the Bishopric of Cloyne, to which he was consecrated in May, 1734. The Earl of Chesterfield offered him the see of Clogher, which was double the value of that of Cloyne, and fines to the amount of £10,000 were then due; but the bishop declined the proffer, remarking to Mrs. Berkeley,

"I desire to add one more to the list of churchmen who are evidently dead to ambition and avarice."

He had not been long stationed at Cloyne before he pub. The Analyst, or a Discourse addressed to an Infidel

Mathematician, Lon., 1735, 8vo. This was addressed to Dr. Halley, with a view of "Showing that Mysteries in Faith were unjustly objected to by mathematicians, who admitted much greater mysteries, and even falsehoods, in science, of which he endeavoured to prove that the doctrine of fluxions furnished an eminent example." See Cunningham's Biog. Diet.; Biog. Brit.

The principal answer to the Analyst was supposed to have been the production of Dr. Jurin; it was entitled Philalethes Cantabrigiensis; the bishop answered this by A Defence of Free-thinking in Mathematics, 1735; and Philalethes responded in the Minute Mathematician. In 1735, also, appeared Berkeley's Querist, intended to stimulate the Irish to develop the resources of their own country. His Discourse addressed to Magistrates, occasioned by the enormous license and irreligion of the times, appeared in 1736; Maxims Concerning Patriotism in 1750, and Measure of Civil Submission in 1784, (posthumous.) We class these tracts together, as they are of the same character. Having been benefited by the use of tar-water during an attack of nervous colic, his active philanthropy induced him to give to the world in 1774, Siris, a Chain of Philosophical Reflections and Inquiries respecting the virtues of Tar-Water in the Plague, 8vo; enlarged and improved, 1747, 8vo. In French, Amst., 1745, 12mo. Farther Thoughts on Tar-Water, 1752, 8vo. Many publications on both sides of the question followed the bishop's work. We shall refer to it again before we close this article. The good man's health was now very infirm, and he longed—as we all promise ourselves to do—to spend some time in retirement from the world before he should "go hence to be no more seen." With this object, he begged leave to resign his bishopric, or exchange it for a canonry at Oxford. The king however declared that Dr. Berkeley should "die a bishop in spite of himself," but he had full permission to reside wherever he might think proper. He accordingly removed to Oxford, letting the lands of his demesne at a rental of £200, which he directed to be applied to the relief of the poor during his absence. He was to return no more; he "had finished his course;" and only a few months after his arrival at Oxford, one Sunday evening, whilst engaged in devout discourse with his family on the lesson in the Burial Service, he was added to the many confirmations of the solemn declaration, "In the midst of life, we are in death;" and without a moment's warning was ushered into the awful presence of the "Judge of all the earth." In 1776 was pub. An Account of his Life, with Notes, containing Strictures upon his Works, 8vo. In 1784, his Whole Works, with an Account of his life, and several of his Letters to Thomas Prior, Esq., Dean Gervais, and Mr. Pope, &c., by T. Prior, Esq., 2 vols. 4to. There have been two recent edits. of his Works, one in 3 vols. 8vo, and another by Rev. G. N. Wright, in 2 vols. 8vo, pub. in 1843. Mr. W. gives a trans. of the Latin Essays, [Arithmetica, Miscellanea, Mathematica, and De Motu,] and notes on the Introduction to Human Knowledge.

The reader will find in Phil. Trans., 1746, a paper of the bishop's, On the Petrification of Lough Neagh in Ireland.

The character of this exemplary divine requires no eulogy at our hands; his contemporaries so well appreciated his virtues whilst living, that extracts from their commendation sound like transcripts from the monumental marble.

"So much understanding," says Bishop Atterbury, "so much innocence, and such humility, I did not think had been the portion of any but angels, till I saw this gentleman."

"I went to court to-day," writes Swift to Stella, "on purpose to present Mr. Berkeley, one of your Fellows of Dublin College, to Lord Berkeley of Stratton. That Mr. Berkeley is a very ingenious man, and a great philosopher; and I have mentioned him to all the ministers, and have given them some of his writings, and I will favour him as much as I can. This I think I am bound to, in honour and conscience, to use all my little credit towards helping forward men of worth in the world."—April 12, 1718.

A long and interesting letter of Swift's to Lord Carteret respecting Berkeley's Bermuda project, will be found in Spence's Anecdotes, p. 252.

Lord Bathurst told Dr. Warton,

"That all the members of the Scribblers Club being met at his house at dinner, they agreed to rally Berkeley, who was also his guest, on his scheme at Bermuda. Berkeley, having listened to all the lively things they had to say, begged to be heard in his turn; and displayed his plan with such an astonishing and animated force of eloquence and enthusiasm, that they were struck dumb, and after some pause rose up all together with earnestness exclaiming, 'Let us all set out with him immediately.'"

"This plan, as well as the author of it, was pronounced to be whimsical by the downright and sarcastic Doctor Douglas, in his Historical and Political Summary; and he treats this excellent man with some degree of severity, and principally, I apprehend, because the bishop, in his Treatise on Tar-Water, had ventured without license to enter the precincts of the learned doctor's procession."—CHANCELLOR KENT.

His influence with Pope, who ascribed "To Berkeley every virtue under heaven," was so great that the eulogist tells us, "In the Moral Poem, I had written an address to our Saviour, imitated from Lucretius's compliment to Epicurus: but omitted it, by the advice of Dean Berkeley."

"Dean Berkeley used to apply Horace's description of the Fortunate Island [Epod. xvi. 41 to 63] to Bermudas, and his scheme of going thither; and was so fond of this Epode on that account, that he got Mr. Pope to translate it into English, and I have seen the translation."—R. A. in Spence's Anecdotes.

The influence of Berkeley's writings in defence of Revelation was most happy:

"Alciphron, or the Minute Philosopher, written with an intention to expose the weakness of infidelity and skepticism, is perhaps the most ingenious and excellent performance of the kind in the English tongue."—Boswell on Study.

This, like all hyperbolical praise, is in bad taste. It is folly to say that any composition on any subject is the "most ingenious and excellent in the language;" one may as well specify, as some thoughtless people do, the handsomest woman, or the most polite man, or the most erudite scholar; such expressions of opinion are insulting to those present, and of but little value to the absent; for persons whose good opinions are to be coveted avoid such shocking absurdities.

It has been well said,

"In whatever estimation the philosophical opinions of Bishop Berkeley may be held by the metaphysicians of the present day, it will be admitted by all who are conversant with his writings, that he was a profound scholar, eminently skilled in logic and physiology, and deeply read in the ancient systems of these sciences. He has a higher claim than this to the veneration of posterity. He was a singularly good man, in whom a warm benevolence to his fellow-creatures, and a zealous piety to God, were not merely the enthusiasms of his heart, but the presiding rule of his life."

Dr. Drake is equally enthusiastic in his admiration of the good bishop:

"It may be said of Berkeley, without exaggeration, that in point of virtue and benevolence, no one of the sons of men has exceeded him. Whether we consider his public or his private life, we pause in admiration of efforts uncommonly exalted, disinterested, and pure. He was alike an object of enthusiastic love and admiration to extensive societies and to familiar friends. . . . His knowledge was of great compass, and extended to all the useful arts and occupations of life, of which it has been said, that there is scarcely one, liberal or mechanic, of which he knew not more than the ordinary practitioner."—Essays, vol. iii.; and see Blackwood's Memoirs of the Court of Augustus, vol. ii.

Even when engaged upon objects not directly in the line of his profession, the good bishop "each fond endearment tries" to raise the minds of his readers to the exalted hopes and consolations connected with a brighter sphere and a higher state of being. Dr. Warton's comment upon Siris is worth quoting in this connexion:

"Many a vulgar critic has sneered at Berkeley's Siris, for beginning at Tar, and ending with the Trinity; incapable of observing the great art with which the transitions in that book are finely made, where each paragraph depends upon and arises out of the preceding, and gradually and imperceptibly leads on the reader from common objects to more remote,—from matter to spirit,—from earth to Heaven."

A valuable Review of Siris will be found in the Retrospective Review, vol. xi. 239. This periodical, now, alas! very scarce and expensive, should be purchased by the lover of Old English Literature, whenever the chance may present itself.

"Tar-Water rose into general esteem as a medicine, soon after Berkeley's book made its appearance. Its virtues as a tonic will probably be admitted at present, [1825;] but it was at that time considered by many persons, and our author was the most zealous amongst them, not merely as a cure for almost every disorder incident to the human frame, but as a sure conservative of health, and a guard against infection and old age."—Retrospec. Review.

For a paper on Berkeley and Idealism, and a notice of Bailey's Review of Berkeley's Theory of Vision, see Blackwood's Magazine, vol. ii. 812.

"The doctrines of Berkeley, incomplete as they appear when viewed as the isolated tenets of an individual, and short as they no doubt fell, in his hands, of their proper and ultimate expression, acquire a fuller and profounder significance when studied in connection with the speculations which have since followed in their train."

The value of the commendation subjoined is too well known to require any thing but the names of the critics:

"Possessing a mind which, however inferior to that of Locke in depth of reflection and in soundness of judgment, was fully its equal in logical acuteness and invention, and in learning, fancy, and taste far its superior, Berkeley was singularly fitted to promote that reunion of Philosophy and of the Fine Arts which is so essential to the prosperity of both. . . . With these intellectual and moral endowments, admired and blazoned as they were by the most distinguished wits of his age, it is not surprising that Berkeley should have given a popularity and fashion to metaphysical pursuits which they had never before acquired in England."—DUGALD STEWART: 1st Frcdim. Diss. to Encyc. Brit.

"Ancient learning, exact science, polished society, modern literature, and the fine arts, contributed to adorn and enrich the mind of this accomplished man. All his contemporaries agreed with the satirist in ascribing Adverse factions and hostile wits concurred only in loving, admiring, and contributing to advance him. The severe sense of Swift endured his visions; the modest Addison endeavoured to reconcile Clarke to his ambitious speculations. His character converted the satire of Pope into servid praise. Even the discerning, fastidious, and turbulent Atterbury said, after an interview with him, 'So much understanding, so much knowledge, so much innocence, and such humility, I did not think had been the portion of any but angels, till I saw this gentleman.' . . . Of the exquisite grace and beauty of his diction, no man accustomed to English composition can need to be informed. His works are, beyond dispute, the finest models of philosophical style since Cicero. Perhaps they surpass those of the orator, in the wonderful art by which the fullest light is thrown on the most minute and evanescent parts of the most subtle of human conceptions. Perhaps he also surpassed Cicero in the charm of simplicity."—SIR JAMES MACKINTOSH: 2d Frcdim. Dissert. Encyc. Brit.

'To Berkeley every virtue under heaven.'

In the life and in the death of Berkeley and Swift there was just that contrast which aims so widely at variance would lead us to expect. The one amidst labours and self-sacrifice passed his days in tranquillity, and,—his last years solaced by

"That which should accompany old age,

As honour, love, obedience, troops of friends"—

whilst engaged in enforcing those truths which his own life had exemplified, exchanged confiding hope for joyful fruition in "the vision of the Almighty." The other, tempest-driven by the storms of passion, the victim of blighted projects and disappointed schemes, at war with his race and with himself, only exchanged insane ravings for idiotic imbecility, and sank into an unhonoured grave, a mournful beacon to all who "set their affections upon the earth," and content themselves with genius unsanctified by heavenly wisdom. Young man! to whom God hath granted mental capacity and intellectual wealth, look first upon that picture, then on this, and say which shall be the object of thy ambition, JONATHAN SWIFT, or GEORGE BERKELEY?

Berkeley, George, 1733–1795, son of the preceding, was admitted of Christ Church, Oxford, at the age of nineteen. He entered into holy orders, and held several preferments—Prebendary of Canterbury, &c.,—at the time of his death. In 1785 he pub. two Sermons respecting the Stuarts and their adherents, 1785–89; and a Sermon on Good Friday, 1787.

"As an author we readily allow that merit in Mr. Berkeley to which we cannot so freely subscribe when we consider him as a statesman or politician. This nation never did, and we apprehend, never can, prosper under the influence of Tory principles of government."—Lon. Monthly Review.

His widow pub. a volume of his Sermons in 1799. This lady, who was a frequent contributor to that invaluable periodical, the Gentleman's Magazine, also pub. in 1797 a volume of poems (with a preface of her own) written by her son, George Monck Berkeley. (See below.)

Berkeley, Hon. George Charles Grantley Fitzharding, son of the fifth Earl of Berkeley, born 1800, was M.P. for Gloucestershire West from 1832 to '52. Author of Berkeley Castle, a Novel, London, 1836, 3 vols. 8vo, which was so severely reviewed by Dr. Maginn, in Fraser's Magazine for August, 1836, that it led to a duel between author and critic, in which three shots were exchanged. Mr. Grantley Berkeley subsequently published another novel, Sandron Hall, 3 vols. p. 8vo, and a pamphlet upon Field-Sports and Poaching.

Berkeley, George Monck, son of the preceding, author of the volume of Poems mentioned above, made some other contributions to the cause of literature. In 1789 he pub. Literary Relics, containing original Letters from King Charles II., King James II., the Queen of Bohemia, Swift, Berkeley, Addison, Steele, Congreve, the Duke of Ormond, and Bishop Rundle; to which is prefixed an Inquiry into the Life of Dean Swift, 8vo.

"The temper of mind with which Mr. Berkeley enters on his inquiry, and its unfavourable tendency to promote truth, will be seen by every one who attends to his treatment of Lord Orrery. His lordship is not only denied all kind of literary merit, but his name is coupled with the most reproachful epithets; we read of 'the yelps of Lord Orrery,' and 'the howl of Lord Orrery.' Lord Orrery is 'a common sewer and a monster,' who, though he had not even the courage of an ass to insult the dying lion, yet, monster-like, preyed upon the carcass."—Lon. Monthly Review.

Berkeley, George, Earl of, d. 1698, aged 71, descended in a direct line from Robert Fitzharding, of the royal house of Denmark, was noted for his exemplary piety and conciliating manners. From this latter characteristic Wycherley was induced to chronicle him as Lord Plausible, in the Plain Dealer. His lordship was author of an excellent book entitled Historical Applications, and occasional Meditations upon several subjects, Lon., 1670, 12mo; 3d edit., 1680. His lordship also pub. A Speech to the Levant Company at their Annual Election, 1686. He gave to the Library of Sion College a valuable collection of books, formed by Sir Robert Coke.

"The Historical Application serves to confirm the account of his lordship's amiable character which was given by Mr. Fenton; and though much enriched by selected passages from other writers, has many valuable sentiments intermingled by the noble moralist."—Park's Walpole's E. & N. Authors.

Berkeley, John. Collectanea Historica complexa ipsius Negotiationem Anni 1647 cum Olivario Cromwel, Ireton, et aliis Exercitus Præfectis pro Revocatione Caroli I. in Regni Administrationem, Lon., 1699, 8vo.

Berkeley, Joshua, D.D. The Difficulties attending a just Explanation of the Scriptures considered, as they have arisen from the gradual Progress of revealed Religion, through a length of time; a Sermon on 2 Tim. ii. 15, 1780, 4to. [Visitation.]

Berkeley, Mary, Countess Dowager of. An Address to the House of Peers of the United Kingdom, Lon., 1811, 8vo. On this claim a number of pamphlets have appeared. See Lowndes's Bibliographer's Manual.

Berkeley, Rev. Thomas. Wilderness, or Prolusions in verse, 1811, 12mo.

Berkeley, Sir William, d. 1677, for nearly 40 years governor of Virginia, was the author of A Discourse and View of Virginia, pp. 12, 1663, fol.; The Lost Lady; A Tragi-Comedy, 1639; and (according to the Biog. Dramat.) a play called Cordelia, 1662, not printed, ascribed to Sir William Bartley. In Francis Moryson's edit. of the Laws of Virginia, Lon., 1662, fol., the Preface informs us that Sir William was the author of the best of them.

Berkenhead, Sir John. See BIRKENHEAD.

Berkenhout, Mrs. Helina. The History of Victoria Mortimer, Lon., 1805, 4 vols. 12mo.

Berkenhout, John, M.D., b. about 1730, d. 1791, a native of Leeds, rose to the rank of Captain in the Prussian service, then studied medicine, and added the claims of authorship and diplomacy to his other titles to distinction. In 1778 he visited Philadelphia, by order of the English government, to assist in the negotiations with the American Congress. He has been very foolishly compared to the "Admirable Crichton." His merits, however, are undoubtedly great. He pub. many professional, and other, works, of which we name a few: Clavis Anglica Linguae Botanicae Linnæi, 1762, 8vo. Pharmacopœia Medicæ, 1756, 8vo; 3d edit., 1762. Outlines of the Natural History of Great Britain and Ireland; containing an arrangement of all the animals, vegetables, and fossils, which have hitherto been discovered in these kingdoms, Lon., 1767-71, 3 vols. 8vo; reprinted together in 1773; and a 2d edit. in 1788, 2 vols. 8vo, under the title of A Synopsis of the Natural History of Great Britain, &c. Biographia Literaria; or a Biographical History of Literature, containing the Lives of English, Scotch, and Irish, Authors, from the dawn of Letters in these kingdoms to the present time, chronologically and classically arranged, vol. i., Lon., 1777, 4to; this is all that appeared. Vol. i. comprehends from the beginning of the 5th to the end of the 16th century. Vols. 2d and 3d were to have been devoted to the authors of the 17th century, and vol. iv. (conclusion) would have taken in the time from 1700 to about 1777.

"The lives are very short, and the author frequently introduces sentiments hostile to religious establishments and doctrines, which could not be very acceptable to English readers. The dates and facts, however, are given with great accuracy; and in many of the lives he profited by the assistance of George Stevens, Esq., the celebrated commentator on Shakespeare."

A new edit. of Campbell's Lives of the Admirals, Lon., 1779, 4to. Symptomatology, Lon., 1784, 8vo. The First Lines of the Theory and Practice of Philosophical Chemistry, Lon., 1778, 8vo, dedicated to Mr. Eden, afterwards Lord Auckland, whom the doctor accompanied to America. Letters on Education, to his son at Oxford, 1791, 2 vols. 12mo. The doctor printed Proposals for a History of Middlesex, including London, 4 vols. fol. The design was abandoned, and the Proposals not circulated. The doctor also pub. treatises on Gout, 1772. Lucubrations on Ways and Means, 1780, and a trans. of Dr. Pomme's Treatise on Hypochondria, &c., in 1777.

"When we reflect on the variety of books that bear his name, we cannot but be surprised at the extent and variety of the knowledge they contain. . . . An individual so universally informed as Dr. Berkenhout, is an extraordinary appearance in the republic of letters."—Chalmers's Biog. Dict.

To sum up the doctor's various characters, he was, 1. A Soldier. 2. A Doctor of Medicine. 3. An Author. 4. A Classical Scholar. 5. A Mathematician. 6. A Botanist. 7. A Chemist. 8. A Political Economist. 9. A Diplomatist. 10. A Poet. 11. A Painter. 12. A Musician. What a hydra-headed member of society was Dr. Berkenhout!

Bernard, Andrew, an Austin Friar, born at Toulouse, was Poeta Laureatus to Henry VII. and Henry VIII., historiographer, and also preceptor in Grammar, to Prince Arthur. He wrote some Latin pieces, which are in MS. in the Cottonian Library; among these are an Address to Henry VIII., a Chronicle of the Life and Achievements of Henry VII. to the taking of Perkin Warbeck, and other historical commentaries on the reign of that king.

"I am of opinion that it was not customary for the royal laureate to write in English, till the reformation of religion had begun to diminish the veneration for the Latin language; or rather, till the love of novelty, and a better sense of things, had banished the narrow pedantries of monastic erudition, and taught us to cultivate our native tongue."—Warton's History of English Poetry, vol. ii.

Bernard, Edward, D.D., 1638-1696, an eminent critic, astronomer, and linguist, was a native of Northamptonshire. In 1655 he was elected scholar of St. John's College, Oxford, of which he was subsequently a Fellow. He visited Holland three times in the course of his learned investigations. In the praiseworthy effort made at Oxford in 1670 to collect and publish the works of the ancient mathematicians, Bernard took an active part. He compiled a valuable synopsis of the authors selected for publication, which compilation will be found in Dr. Thomas Smith's Life of Bernard. It is to be regretted that the plan was not carried out with the same zeal which first suggested it. He drew up a very complete Index to the Catalogus Manuscriptorum Angliæ et Hiberniæ, Oxon., 1697, fol. In this Index he specifies many valuable Greek MSS. in several foreign libraries, as well as those at home. In 1673 he succeeded Christopher Wren, to whom he had been deputy since 1669, as Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford. His contributions to the works of his learned contemporaries were numerous. For a list, see Watt's Bib. Brit. Dr. Smith mentions one admirable trait in his character, which we desire in our present literary undertaking to profit by:

"He was a candid judge of other men's performances; not too censorious even on trifling books, if they contained nothing contrary to good manners, virtue, or religion; and to those which displayed wit, learning, or good sense, none gave more ready and ample praise."—Life of Bernard.

We would fain make our Index Expurgatorius as small as possible, yet at our own hazard must we remember the motto of our illustrious predecessors of the Edinburgh Review—the only line of Publius Syrius according to Sydney Smith, with which the critics were acquainted:

"INDEX DAMNATUR CUM NOCENS ANSOLVITUR."

Many books from Dr. Bernard's Library were purchased for the Bodleian Library by the agency of Humphrey Wanley.

"The addition made to the Bodleian from Dr. Bernard's study was of the greatest importance, and contained many of the most valuable books, both printed and MSS., now in the library." See Wanley's interesting memoranda in Bliss's Wood's Athen. Oxon., vol. iv. 707.

"He was a person admirably well read in all kinds of ancient learning, in Astronomy and Mathematics, a curious Critic, an excellent Grecian, Latinist, Chronologer, and Orientalist."—Wool.

Bernard, Sir Francis, Bart., d. 1779, Governor, first, of New Jersey, and afterwards of Massachusetts, pub. Letters to the Earl of Hillsborough, and Letters to the Ministry, Lon., 1769, 8vo. Select Letters on the Trade and Government of America, &c., 1774, 8vo. Some of his Greek and Latin Poems were pub. in the Pietas and Gratulatio, Camb., 1761.

Bernard, H. H. Guide to the Hebrew Biblical Student, Lon., 8vo. The Main Principles of the Creed, and Ethics of the Jews, &c., Camb., 1832, 8vo.

"Besides communicating to the English reader the sentiments, traditions, and sayings of the ancient rabbins quoted by Maimonides, the volume will materially contribute to supply the Biblical student with the means, at present scarcely within his reach, of acquiring an accurate knowledge of rabbinical Hebrew."—Horne's Introduction.

Usher on the Extent of Christ's Death and Satisfaction, on the Sabbath, and Observance of the Lord's Day, Lon., 1657, 8vo. This treatise was noticed by Dr. Peter Heylyn in Respondent Petrus, &c., 1668, 4to. Devotions of the Ancient Church, in seven pious prayers, Lon., 1660, 8vo. Clavi Trabales, &c., Lon., 1661, 4to, and some other publications.

"Archbishop Usher, having daily opportunities of taking notice of the parts, and the solidity of learning and judgment of Mr. Bernard, employed him in making collections for some works he was then meditating, and more particularly for the Antiquities of the British Churches, which did not appear in public till the year 1639."—Biog. Brit.

Bernard, Richard, b. 1566, or 1567, d. 1641, an eminent Puritan divine, was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge. Terence's Comedies trans. into English, 1598, 4to; often reprinted; the first trans. into English of the whole of Terence. Plain Evidence that the Church of England is Apostolical, and the separation schismatical, 1610, 4to. A Key for opening the Mysteries of the Revelation of St. John, Lon., 1617, 4to. The Fabulous Foundation of the Popedom, showing that St. Peter was never at Rome, Oxf., 1619, 4to. Faithful Shepherd, 1607, 4to. Look beyond Luther, Lon., 1623, 4to. He pub. several other pieces against the Church of Rome. A Guide to Grand Jurymen with respect to Witches, Lon., 1627, 12mo. This part of the country, according to Granville, was much infected with Witches. The Isle of Man, or legal proceedings in Man-shire against Sin, Lon., 1627, 8vo. The work reached its 10th edit. in 1635! Some suppose it to have been the germ of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, and Holy War. We shall refer to this subject under BUNYAN. The Bible Battels, or the Sacred Art Military, Lon., 1629, 12mo. Thesaurus Biblicus sive Promptuarium Sacrum, Londini, 4to, with portrait by Hollar, Lon., 1661, fol.; enlarged edit., 1664. Ruth's Recompense, &c., Lon., 1628, 4to, and other works.

Bernard, Sir Thomas, 1750-1818, son of Sir Francis Bernard, (see ante,) was educated at Harvard College, New England. He practised for a few years as conveyancer, but retiring from business, devoted his life to the benefit of the public. The improvement of the physical and religious condition of the poor, and the literary and scientific advancement of the wealthier classes of society equally enlisted the zeal and called forth the energies of this truly amiable man. The chimney-sweeper of St. Giles felt the ameliorating influence of his benevolent interposition, and Sir Humphry Davy won undying laurels on the stage of the Royal Institution, which Sir Francis Bernard contributed to found. The Free Chapel in St. Giles, the British Institution, and the Hospital for Foundlings, bear witness to the noble philanthropy of a man who had practically learned the lesson that "none of us liveth to himself." In the establishment of the Royal Institution, he had the active co-operation of Count Rumford. See an interesting account of the first lectures at this Institution, in Dibdin's Reminiscences, vol. I.

Sir Thomas pub. a number of works on the objects which engrossed his care; among them, are Observations relating to the Liberty of the Press, Lon., 1793, 8vo. Letter to the Lord Bishop of Durham on the Measures under consideration of Parliament for promoting Industry and the Relief of the Poor, 1807, 8vo. The New School; being an attempt to illustrate its Principles and Advantages, 3d edit., 1810, 8vo. The Barrington School; being an Illustration of the Principles, Practices, and Effects of the System of Instruction, in facilitating the Religious and Moral Instruction of the Poor, 1812, 8vo. An Account of the supply of Fish for the Manufacturing Poor, 1813, 8vo. On the Supply of Employment and Subsistence for the Labouring Classes in Fisheries, Manufactures, and Cultivation of Waste Land, &c., 1816. This good man also wrote Spurinna, or the Comforts of Old Age; with Notes and Biographical Illustrations, 1816, 8vo. The author had taken the most certain means of securing the Comforts of Old Age, by devoting his days of strength and activity to the good of his fellow-man, and the honour of his God. With the view of inducing others to seek true happiness in the unfailing source from which he had long drawn his own consolations, he pub. in 1806, An Historical View of Christianity, containing Select Passages from Scripture, with a Commentary by Edward Gibbon, Esq., and Notes by Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, M. de Voltaire, and others. "The intention of the editor of this singular publication is to prove the authenticity of Divine revelation from the testimony of its bitterest enemies. It is a very ingenious method of turning the weapons of unbelievers against themselves."—LONDONER.

He was connected with Dr. Dibdin in the publication of the Director, 2 vols., 1807, 8vo, a weekly periodical, in which notices of the Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution, and the Pictures exhibited at the Bristol Gallery, occupy a prominent place. His friend and coadjutor bears testimony to the excellence of the subject of our memoir.

"Sir Thomas Bernard did much and great good as a philanthropist. . . . He resolved to devote the approaching autumn of his life to objects of real practical utility, and he made BETHLEHEM THE COMMISSION OF THE POOR one of those most essential objects. Howard explored dungeons, Sir Thomas visited drawing-rooms, to lay them under contribution for the support of his avowed darling object. In short, benevolence may be said to have become fashionable under his influence. Great efforts, on all sides, were made, and societies and establishments out of number sprung up to 'bless our virtuals with increase and to satisfy our poor with bread.'"—Dibdin's Reminiscences.

Bernard, William Bayle, b. 1808, at Boston: he prepared for the press his father's "Recollections of the Stage," and was the author of many popular plays, the best-known of which are: The Nervous Man and The Man of Nerve; Irish Attorney; The Mummy; His Last Legs; Dumb Belle; The Boarding-School; Round of Wrong; Life's Trials, &c.

Bernardi, Major John, 1657-1736, an English officer, descended from an ancient family which had flourished at Lucca, Italy, from the year 1097, was a zealous adherent of James II. In 1696 he was imprisoned as accomplice in the plot for assassinating King William. There was no proof against him, yet six successive parliaments (under four sovereigns) passed acts to detain him and five others in prison. He died in Newgate, after a confinement of nearly forty years. He wrote an account of his Life, Lon., 1729, 8vo. See Biog. Brit.

Bernays, Leopold J. Goethe's Faust, part ii. A trans., partly in the Metres of the Original, and partly in Prose, of Part ii. of Goethe's Faust; with other Poems, demy 8vo.

"Mr. Bernays, an idolater of the poet, has rendered his extraordinary production partly into prose and partly into the original metres; in both he has displayed a knowledge of his principal, and a command of the two languages."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"Mr. Bernays's most exact and very excellent translation."—Conservative Journal.

Berners, John Bouchier, Lord, d. 1532, aged 63, a descendant of Edward III., Chancellor of the Exchequer under Henry VIII., and Deputy-General of Calais and its Marches, is best known as a translator of the grand old Chronicle of Froissart. Froissart, a canon of two churches, was a resident of England, as Secretary to the Queen of Edward III., from 1361 to 1366. In 1395 he paid another visit to England. His Chronicle—which is one of the most enchanting pictures or picture-galleries ever devised by the wit and drawn by the pen of man—depicts the campaign of Edward III. upon the Continent, and contemporaneous events in the principal countries of Europe. In the formation of his history Froissart employed 40 years. That amiable enthusiast, Dr. Dibdin, thus commends this author:

"Let me press strongly on the 'Young Man's' attention, the importance, the instruction, and the never-failing source of amusement, of his history: which has alike endeared the author to the antiquary, the man of taste, and even to the lover of romantic lore. The pages of Froissart exhibit a perfectly natural and pleasing picture. Conversations, skirmishes, battles—the country, the town—scenes within the tent, the palace, or the church—the quiet of pastoral occupations, or the tumult of a popular assembly—these, and every thing which he touches, are hit off in a manner the most simple and striking imaginable; and severe indeed must be that taste, and fastidious that feeling, which shall deny to the pages of this historian the merit of great interest, candour, and apparent fidelity. His episodes are occasionally delightful, and it is evident that he was fond of them. He has also a peculiar art in suspending the main narrative, (when the interest is becoming more and more intense,) by the relation of a number of little circumstances which only makes us return to it with a keener appetite. . . . It cannot be denied that Froissart has admirably described the campaigns of our Edward upon the Continent, when the British arms were covered with glory; when a spirit of chivalry, amounting to the romantic, stirred every breast, and nerved every arm. The splendours of Cressy and Poitiers are but slightly shaded, if at all, by the achievements of Agincourt and Waterloo.”

—Library Companion.

“Did you ever read Froissart?”—“No,” says Morton’s answer. “I have half a mind,” said Claverhouse, “to contrive you should have six months’ imprisonment, in order to procure you that pleasure. His chapters inspire me with more enthusiasm than poetry itself.”—Old Mortality.

As the name of Monstrelet is closely associated with Froissart, we may mention that the history of the former, the Chronicles of France and England, comprehends the period from 1400 to 1467, continued by others to 1516: (see notice of the translations of Froissart and Monstrelet, by Colonel Thomas Johnes, under his name.) Lord Berners’s translation of Froissart’s Chronicles, made by command of Henry VIII., has been highly commended.

“A soldier, a statesman, and a scholar, this nobleman was singularly well adapted for the task which he undertook. Indeed, considering the period of its completion, it was a sort of literary miracle.”—DIBDIN: Library Companion.

In correctness, as well as in other valuable qualities, Lord Berners’s translation has been considered superior to that of Colonel Johnes.

“In imitating the style of his original, Lord Berners’s translation becomes peculiarly valuable to an English reader. His version is faithful, but not servile; and he imitates the spirit and simplicity of the original, without allowing us to discover, from any deficiency in either of these particulars, that his own work is a translation.”—From the reprint of Pynson’s 1st edit. of 1523-25: E. V. UTTERSON.

Lord Berners’s translation first appeared in 1523-25, printed by Pynson in two folio volumes. A perfect copy of this edition is very rarely to be found: sold at the Roxburgh sale, 1798, for £63. The latter portion of the second volume is sometimes “made up” from the reprint by Middleton, vide ante.

“He who has the reprint of 1812, 4to, two vols., [by E. V. Uttersson,] may rest perfectly satisfied that he has the text of Lord Berners as correctly given as in the first edition by Pynson, with a great number of proper names, in places and persons corrected into the bargain. If, however, the ‘Young Man’ sigh, and sigh deeply, for the oak-bounded impression of Pynson, he must purchase it—but with caution and previous collation.”—DIBDIN.

We give a list of translations by Lord Berners. The reader will notice the variable orthography of the name and title of the knight; of those cited, no two are altogether alike. 1. The Chronicles of Englande, Fraunce, Spayne, Portynge, Scotlande, Bretaine, Flaunders, and other Places adionynge, translated out of Frenche into our maternall Englyshe Tonge, by Johan Bourchier knyght, Lorde Berners. London, by Richard Pynson, 1523-25. Made, as we have stated above, by command of Henry VIII.

2. The Hystory of the moost noble and valyaunt knyght Arthur of lytell brytaine, translated out of frensche in to englyshe by the noble Johan bourgcher knyght lorde Berners, newly emprinted. This was printed by Redborne.

“In the class of romances of chivalry we have several translations in the black letter; such are the Mort d’Arthur, Huon of Bordeaux, etc. The best translations, now very rare and high priced, are those of Lord Berners, the admirable translator of Froissart, in the reign of Henry 8; and not the least of his merits is now the genuine antique cast of his style.”—Curiosities of Literature.

See copious notices of the translation of Arthur in the British Bibliographer, iv., 228, and in Dibdin’s Ames, iv., 190. There was a new edition by E. V. Uttersson, pub., Lon., 1814, 4to; with a series of plates from illuminated drawings.

3. The Famous Exploits of Huon de Bourdeaux, trans. by Sir John Bourchier, Lorde Berners, Lon., 1601, 4to; 3d edit. Done at the desire of the Earl of Huntingdon. Tanner, p. 116.

4. The golden Boke of Marcus Aurelius, Emperour and Oratour, translated out of Frenche into Englyshe by Johan Bourchier, Knyghte, Lorde Berners. London in the House of Tho. Berthelet, (1534,) 16mo. Thirteen editions between 1534 and 1587! Undertaken at the desire of his nephew, Sir Francis Bryan.

5. The Castle of Loue, translated out of Spaynyshe into Englyshe by Johan Bourchier Knyght Lorde Berners. Impr. by me Robert Wyer, 8vo. Dedicated to the lady of Sir Nicholas Carew, at whose desire he translated it from the Spanish.

He also composed a book entitled Of the Duties of the Inhabitants of Calais, and a Comedy called Ite in Vineam, which was usually acted in the great Church at Calais after vespers.

“Several letters by Lord Berners occur in the British Museum, Cotton., Calig. D. ix., Vesp. C. i. and V. xiii., HABL., 295. In Vespasian, C. i., 147, is an original dispatch from Lord Berners and John Kite to King Henry the Eighth, giving an account of their interview with Charles, King of Castile and Arragon. This is very curious, and has been reprinted in Uttersson’s edition of Froissart, preface p. 12.”—Note in Ellis’s Wood’s Athen. Oxon.

“Lord Berners. . . . was instructed in several sorts of learning in this university in the latter end of K. Edw. 4; in whose reign and before, were the sons of divers of the English nobility educated in academical literature in Balliol Coll., wherein, as ’tis probable, this our author was instructed also. After he had left the university, he travelled into divers countries, and returned a master of several languages and a compleat gentleman. But that which made him first known to the world, was his valour shew’d in quelling the fury of the rebels in Cornwall and Devon, under the conduct of Michael Joseph, a blacksmith, about 1406, whereby he greatly gained the favour of K. Henry.”—Athen. Oxon.

“Having there [at Calais] gotten a repose, who formerly had been a far traveller and great linguist, he translated many books out of French, Spanish, and Italian, besides some of his own making. [Bale de Scripturis Britannicis Cent. vii., num. i., and Pitts, in anno 1532.] I behold him as the second (accounting the Lord Tiptoft the first) noble hand, which, since the decay of learning, took a pen therein, to be author of a book.”—Miller’s Worthies.

“But I have shown that Lord Berners was but the fifth writer among the nobility, in order of time.”—Walpole’s Royal and Noble Authors.

In this work is a long extract from Lord Berners’s epistle dedicatory of the Castle of Love, to Lady Carew. We give a short specimen, which is curious as exhibiting the orthography of the day:

“To the good and vertuous lady; the lady Carewe, gretyngs.

“The adiecent deure and obligation that I am bounde in towarde you, ryghte vertuous and good lady, as well for the goodness that it hath pleased you to shewe me, as for the nyrenesse of consanguinite, hath encouraged me to accompylysh your deure, in translating this present booke. And though my so doyngs can not be correspondent any thing to recompense your goodness, yet not being ignorant of your goodwill and deure, the which in this cause I take for the hole effecte; thinking thereby to do you some smalle remembrance, and also because the matter is very pleasant for yonge ladies and gentlewomen: therefore I have enterpreted to reduce the same from Spanshe into the Englyshe tongue, not adorned with so freche eloquence that it should merite to be presented to your goodness.”

Berners, or Barnes, Juliana, b. about 1388, is believed to have been the daughter of Sir James Berners, a favourite of Richard the Second, and beheaded in 1388 as an evil counsellor to the king, and an enemy to the public. Juliana was celebrated for her extreme beauty and great learning. She was prioress of Sopewell Nunnery near St. Alban’s, where she varied the devotions of the cloister with the sports of the field. Willing to impart to others a knowledge of the mysteries which afforded so much satisfaction to herself, she wrote treatises on Hawking, Hunting, Fishing, and Heraldry.

“From an abbess disposed to turn author, we might more reasonably have expected a manual of meditations for the closet, or select rules for making salves, or distilling strong waters. But the diversions of the world were not thought inconsistent with the character of a religious lady of this eminent rank, who resembled an abbot in respect of exercising an extensive manorial jurisdiction; and who hawked and hunted in common with other ladies of distinction. This work however is here mentioned because the second of these treatises is written in rhyme. It is spoken in her own person; in which, being otherwise a woman of authority, she assumes the title of Dame. I suspect the whole to be a translation from the French and Latin.”—Watson’s History of English Poetry, vol. ii.

“The treatise on fishing is not only the earliest, but by far the most curious essay upon angling which has ever appeared in the English, or perhaps any other, language. In the most important features, Walton has closely followed this production. In piety and virtue,—in the inculcation of morality,—in an ardent love for their art, and still more, in that placid and Christian spirit for which the amiable Walton was so conspicuous, the early writer was scarcely inferior to his or her more celebrated successor.”—London’s Bibliographer’s Manual, which see for particulars of early editions.

There are three treatises comprised in one volume with this title: The Bokys of Hawking and Hunting, and also of Cootarmuris, at St. Alban’s, 1486, small folio. So rare is this volume, that Dr. Dibdin estimates a perfect copy (of which Earl Spencer and the Earl of Pembroke each had one) to be worth £420; a very imperfect copy produced £147 at the sale of the Library of the Duke of Roxburgh; resold at the sale of the White Knight’s (Duke of Marlborough’s) Library for £84. The third book, on Heraldic Blasphemy, is supposed to be an addendum to the two preceding, and a portion of a work by Nicholas Upton, written about 1441. Indeed Mr. Haslewood considers that the only portions of the book which can safely be attributed to Dame Berners are: 1. A small portion of the Treatise on Hawking. 2. The Treatise upon Hunting. 3. A Short List of the Beasts of Chase; and Another Short one of Beasts and Fowls. We have no space for a list of early editions, the last of which was printed in 1595 in 4to. Mr. Haslewood's edition (Lon., 1810, folio) is an exact reprint of that by Wynkyn de Worde, 1496. 150 copies were printed. In the Bibliographical Introduction (a few copies of which were struck off separately) will be found a full account of the first editions of this curious work. As few of our readers are likely to have an opportunity of seeing this rare book, we shall give them a specimen of the style of this Di Vernon of the elder time. Speaking of "fyschyng", she affectionately exhorts the prospective angler, and moralises on this wise:

"Ye shall not use this frowyd crafty dysporte for no covetyse, to the encreasyng and sparyng of your money only; but principally for your solace, and to cause the helthe of your body, and specially of your soule: for whaune ye purpose to goo on your dysportes in fyschyng, ye wold not desyre grety many persons with you, whyche lett you of your game. And thence ye may seeve God devoutly in saying affectuously your custumable prayer; and, thus doyng, ye shall eschewe and voyde many vices."

In order that the angler might bethake him or herself quietly, and without attracting attention and company, to their "fyschyng dysporte," she gives instructions for a walking cane-rod, which should give no indication of the anticipated "dysporte," and the bewitching, though it must be confessed rather sly, Juliana triumphantly declares,

"And thus shall ye make you a rodde so pryvy, that ye may walk therwith; and there shall noo man wyte where aboute ye goo." See art. on Angling in the London Quarterly Review, vol. lxvii.

The book on Armory commences with the following curious piece of sacred heraldry:

"Of the offspring of the gentillman Jaseth, come Habraham, Moyses, Aron, and the profetys: and also the kyng of the right lyne of Mary, of whom that gentillman Jhesus was borne, very God and man: after his manhode kyng of the land of Jude and of Jues, gentillman by his modre Mary, prince of cote armure, &c."

"Altogether undeserving of the public attention: it is a crude and irregular production, neither to be commended for its matter nor its style. The allegations from Scripture are weak and uncritical; the arguments, drawn from the depravity of the mind, are declamatory and false, and several of the authorities are misrepresented, and at best nothing to the purpose."—*Lon. Bethum, John. 1. Short View. 2. Essays, 1770-1.

Bethune, Alexander, 1804-1843, a native of Fife-shire, Scotland, was the son of a farm-labourer. His brother John, 1812-1839, was a native of "The Mount," once the home of Sir David Lindsay. By the kindness of those liberal patrons of literature—who have done so much for the improvement of the public mind—William and Robert Chambers of Edinburgh, Alexander Bethune made his appearance as an author in 1835, by the publication of two stories illustrative of Scottish Rural Life: (see Chambers's Journal, 1835.) In 1838 appeared Tales and Sketches of the Scottish Peasantry; a small portion of this volume was written by John Bethune, (see post.) It produced about £20. Practical Economy Explained and Enforced, in a Series of Lectures, by the brothers Alexander and John, was pub. in 1809. In this year John died. The Scottish Peasant's Fireside, a Series of Tales and Sketches illustrating the Character of the Peasantry of Scotland, made its appearance in 1843. In 1841 some Poems left by John were pub. with a sketch of the author's life by his brother. Alexander followed his brother to the grave in 1843. William Crombie, author of Hours of Thought, &c., pub. in 1845 Memoirs of Alexander Bethune, embracing Selections from his Correspondence and Literary Remains.

"The quantity of verse and prose which he [John Bethune] produced, under the circumstances, was truly astonishing. If printed in full, they would occupy several volumes. As far as we can judge from the specimens in the books which are before us, the language was always correct, the lines smooth and flowing, and the rhymes good: but of course he had little range of thought or copiousness of diction, and further cultivation of mind would probably have induced him to abandon poetry for prose."—(From an interesting article, to which we are indebted for the above particulars, by Francis Bowen, in N. Amer. Rev., vol. lxvii., 1848.)

"The perusal of this book [Tales and Sketches of the Scottish Peasantry, by Alexander Bethune] has affected us more than any thing we have read for many years past, and has revived in our bosom recollections of youth and rural manners, which, though they may be dormant for a time, amid the engrossing cares of the world, can never be obliterated, and can never die. . . . All is nature, all is real, because the author, instead of drawing out his imagination, has written nothing but what he himself has seen or known."—Edinburgh Chronicle.

Bethune, George W., D.D., b. 1805, a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church, is well known as an accomplished scholar and eloquent pulpit orator. Dr. Bethune is a native of the city of New York. He has been stationed successively at Rhinebeck, Utica, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn, in which latter city he now (1858) resides. Dr. Bethune has been offered and has declined the chaplaincy of the United States Military Academy at West Point, the Chancellorship of the New York University, and the Professorship of Ecclesiastical History and Church Government in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Dutch Church. He is author and editor of a number of volumes: A Word to the Afflicted; British Female Poets; Lays of Love and Faith; Fruit of the Spirit; History of a Penitent; Sermons; Orations and Occasional Discourses, etc. His edition of Walton's Complete Angler, with an exceedingly valuable bibliographical preface, &c., has been highly commended. This work was compiled in the chance moments of relief from graver studies. "I lost no time by it," the editor remarked to the present writer, "for it was the occupation of moments when others would have been looking out of the windows."

"The American portion of the work," [The Complete Angler,] remarks a critic, "so rich in rare scholarship, indicates both the research and the sentiment desirable in a true brother of the angle. There is always a dash of poetry in such men—displaying itself in a love of nature or a vein of sentiment. The latter predominates in Dr. Bethune."

Lays of Love and Faith; with other Poems.

"The songs in this volume are particularly melodious and tender, and there is a relish of mingled scholarship and fun in some of the epigrams, most rare in these days. The Poems are introduced to the reader in a sonnet which so happily characterizes their most characteristic qualities, that we quote it as more to the point than any further remarks of our own:

"As one arranges in a simple vase
A little store of unpretending flowers,
So gathered I some records of past hours,
And trust them, gentle reader, to thy grace;
Nor hope that in my pages thou wilt trace
The brilliant proof of high poetic powers;
But read memorials of my happy days,
When heaven shed blessings on my heart like showers;
Clothing with beauty even the desert place;
Till I, with thankful gladness in my looks,
Turned me to God, sweet nature, loving friends,
Christ's little children, well-worn ancient books,
The charm of art, the rapture music sends;
And sang away the grief that on man's lot attends."

A large number of Dr. Bethune's Sermons and Addresses have been printed: among them are his annual discourses before The Foreign Evangelical Society, The American Sunday-School Union, The A. B. C. Foreign Missions, &c. He has delivered Phi Beta Kappa Orations at Dartmouth, Harvard, and Brown Universities, and Orations at Yale and other Colleges.

Betterton, Thomas, 1635-1710, a celebrated English actor, wrote several dramatic pieces, and altered a number for the stage. The Biog. Dramatica gives the following list:

"1. The Roman Virgin; or Unjust Judge, T., 4to, 1679. 2. The Revenge; or a Match in Newgate, C., 4to, 1680. 3. The Prophets; or the History of Dioclesian, Altered, O., With a Masque, 4to, 1690. 4. The Bondman; or, Love and Liberty, T. C., 8vo, 1719. 8. The Woman made a Justice, Com., N. P.

"Of these we have not much more to say, than that those which are properly his own are not devoid of merit, and those which he has only altered have received an advantage from his amendment."

Among other eloquent eulogies upon Mr. Betterton, we may refer to those of Colley Cibber, Anthony Aston, and Addison.

"Such an actor as Mr. Betterton ought to be recorded with the same respect as Roscus among the Romans. . . . I have hardly a notion that any performance of antiquity could surpass the action of Mr. Betterton in any of the occasions in which he has appeared on our stage."—ADDISON: Tuller, No. 167.

Beulanianus, a British divine and historian of the 7th century, was the instructor of the celebrated Nennius, afterwards abbot of the monastery of Bangor. Beulanianus is said to have written a work entitled De Genealogiis Gentium.

Benianius, Samuel, son of the preceding, was born in Northumberland and educated in the Isle of Wight.

"He was a man of a very humane and mild disposition, a good historian, and well skilled in geometry. He gave an accurate description of the Isle of Wight from his own observations, as well as from the accounts of Ptolemy and Pliny."

He also wrote Annotations upon Nennius, a History of the actions of King Arthur in Scotland, and an Historical Itinerary. Leland is of opinion that he was a monk.

"The narrative of St. Paul's life is studiously related in the very words of Scripture, having only such additional matter as is necessary to introduce or connect the several parts. Attention, however, has been paid to the task of selecting, from different parts of the New Testament, such passages as belong to the regular chain of the history. The notes are principally selected from the best critics and commentators, and those which are geographical are the most conspicuous, and stamp a real value on the work; which, though designed for young persons of his own religious communion, (The Society of Friends,) may be studied with advantage by those of every other class of Christians, especially such as have not many commentators within their reach, without danger of finding any thing introduced which can give the smallest bias towards any principle that is not really and truly Christian."—Horne's Introduction; British Critic, O. "In this very elaborate work the authenticity of Matt. i. and ii. and Luke i. and ii. are most satisfactorily vindicated from the objections of the Editors of the Unitarian Version of the New Testament; whose disingenuous alterations in successive editions of that work are exposed in the Appendix."—Horne's Introduction.

Bever, Thomas, LL.D., 1725-1781, Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford, April 5, 1758, delivered lectures on Civil Law. In 1766 he pub. the introduction to the course under the title of A Discourse on the Study of Jurisprudence and the Civil Law, Lon., 4to. The History of the Legal Polity of the Roman State; and of the Rise, Progress, and Extent of the Roman Laws, Lon., 1781, 4to.

"In this work he has made deep researches into the constitution of the Roman State, and displays an extensive fund of learning, connected with the investigation of the Civil Law."

"He was a better scholar than writer, and a better writer than pleader."—Dr. Coore.

"Bever's Legal Polity is a copious, and, we fear, a somewhat tedious, work, which, however, is not destitute of merit. It was translated into the German language by Völkel, who has corrected many of his errors, for the author left many errors to correct. Bever writes like a scholar and a man of ability, but he laboured under the disadvantage of being, in a great measure, unacquainted with the best civilians of the continent, more especially those of recent date."—Dr. Irving.

"He has, with great perspicuity, traced the progress of the civil law through a series of near two thousand years. He intended, in another volume, to have continued his history to a later period, which never was carried into execution."—Martin's Legal Bibl.

Beveridge, John, a native of Scotland, was in 1758 appointed Professor of Languages in the College and Academy of Philadelphia. He pub. in 1715 a vol. of Latin poems, entitled Epistolæ familiares et alia quædam miscellanæ.

"In an address to John Penn he suggests that a conveyance to him of some few acres of good land would be a proper return for the poetic mention of the Penn family. The Latin hint was lost upon the Englishman. The unwarded poet continued to ply the birch in the vain attempt to govern 70 or 80 ungovernable boys."

Beveridge, Thomas. A Practical Treatise on the Forms of Process; containing the new regulations before the Court of Sessions, Inner House, outer House, and Bill Chamber, the Court of Teinds and the Jury Court, Edin., 2 vols. 8vo, 1826.

"Mr. Beveridge's Treatise on the Forms of Judicial Proceedings in Scotland, is the best manual of practice to which the lawyer, practitioner, or student, can refer: and, indeed, it has superseded every other publication in regard to our judicial procedure."—1 Edin. L. C. cxxxiii.

Beveridge, William, D.D., 1636-37-1708, was a native of Barrow, in Leicestershire, of which parish his grandfather and brother were successively vicars. In 1653 he was admitted a sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge. He applied himself with so much assiduity to the study of the oriental tongues, that at the age of 18, he composed (published when he was 20) a treatise on their great utility, entitled De Linguarum Orientalium, præsertim Hebræicæ, Chaldaicæ, Syriacæ, Arabicæ, et Samaritanæ, Præstantiâ et Usu, cum Grammaticâ Syriacâ, tribus Libris traditâ per G. Beveridgium, Lon., 1658, 8vo. This treatise was compiled for the use of those who desired to study Walton's Polyglot. A 2d edit. of the treatise, and also of the Syriac Grammar, was pub. in 1654. In 1660-61 he received holy orders, and shortly afterwards was collated by Bishop Sheldon to the vicarage of Ealing, in Middlesex. In this parish he remained for nearly 12 years. In 1669 he pub. his Institutionem Chronologicarum Libris duo una cum totidem Arithmetices Chronologicæ Libellis, 4to.

"Professedly no more than a manual of the science of which it treats, but extremely useful to those who wish to understand its technical part, being clear of those obscurities by which Scaliger and Petau had embarrassed it."

In 1672 he pub. his principal work,—Synodicon, sive Pandectæ Canonum S. 8. Apostolorum et Conciliorum ab Ecclesiâ Græca receptorum, &c. This collection of the Apostolic Canons, and of the Decrees of the Councils received by the Greek Church, together with the Canonical Epistles of the Fathers, was pub. at Oxford in 2 large folio volumes.

"A book to be referred to on matters relative to the doctrines and discipline of the Church. Bp. Beveridge had a great attachment to antiquity, and thought the Apostolical Canons were composed near the end of the second century—a much later date is generally assigned to them."—BICKERSTETH.

"Bishop Beveridge's notes contain much very learned exposition of the canon law, and much instructive matter on other subjects connected with the learning of the canons."—VAN ESPEN.

In 1679 he pub. in Latin a vindication of the above-named work, in answer to some observations of M. de l'Arroque, pub. anonymously. In this year, also, he proceeded to the degree of D.D. In 1674 he was collated by Bishop Henchman, then Bishop of London, to the prebend of Chiswick, and in 1681, Bishop Compton, successor to Bishop Henchman, collated him to the Archdeaconry of Colchester. He thus presented a remarkable instance of the reception of preferment from three successive Bishops of London. In 1691 he declined the see of Bath and Wells, vacated by the deprivation of Dr. Thomas Ken, a non-juror. In 1704 he was consecrated Bishop of St. Asaph. Here, as in his former positions, he zealously laboured for the increase of piety in the church. Sermons were preached on Sunday evenings in some of the largest churches; the custom of weekly communion was revived; societies were established for the suppression of vice, and "the poor had the gospel preached to them." Two societies were established—For Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and Promoting Christian Knowledge,—to which the bishop left the principal part of his estate, and which are this day (1858) carrying out his pious intentions. Bishop Beveridge deservedly gained the title of "the great reviver and restorer of primitive piety." To aid his clergy in the duty to which he urged them of thoroughly grounding their people in the fundamentals of Christianity, he prepared and sent to them The Church Catechism Explained; for the Use of the Divines of St. Asaph, Lon., 1704, 4to; several times reprinted. After holding his see for about three and a half years, this good man died in his 71st year in his apartment in the cloister in Westminster Abbey. He was a widower without children. He left his library to St. Paul's, for the benefit of the clergy in London. Among his other bequests is one intended to revive the custom of daily public prayer. He bequeathed to the curacy of Mount-Sorrel, and vicarage of Barrow, Leicester, £20 per annum forever, on condition that prayers be read morning and evening every day according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, in the chapel and parish church aforesaid. A few occasional sermons, and the Exposition of the Catechism, are the only works pub. by the bishop in English. But from his MSS. his executor, Mr. Timothy Gregory, pub. a number of works: Thesaurus Theologicus, or a complete system of Divinity, Lon., 1710, 4 vols. 8vo.

"This system is summed up in notes upon select places of the Old and New Testaments: wherein the sacred text is reduced under proper heads, explained and illustrated, with the opinions and authorities of the ancient fathers, councils, &c."

Other editions, in 2 vols., 1816, '20, '23, '28. 150 Sermons and Discourses on several subjects, Lon., 1709-14, 12 vols. 12mo; 1720, 2 vols. fol.

"The Sermons of such as Bps. Reynolds and Beveridge, of Miller, Richardson, Simeon, &c., will furnish more especially those evangelical doctrines, which, clearly exhibiting salvation by Christ, are alone eminently blessed of God in giving spiritual life to the hearers."—BICKERSTETH.

There have been several "Selections" pub. from the bishop's sermons by Glasco, Dakins, &c. Private Thoughts upon Religion, digested into 12 Articles, with Practical Resolutions framed thereupon, Lon., 1709, 8vo. Numerous editions. Written when only 23 years of age.

"Beveridge's Private Thoughts are most valuable, and fit to be read by a young minister."—Dr. DODDARD.

"They have been of inestimable service to the Church, from the deep piety and devotion and evangelical sentiments of the excellent bishop."—BICKERSTETH.

"His work is in a strain of popular yet close reasoning, proceeding from deep conviction of the radical truths of Christianity, and a devotional spirit."—WILLIAMS.

The Private Thoughts have been edited, with introductory Essays, by Dr. Chalmers, 1828, Rev. H. Stebbing, &c. The latter adds the bishop's treatise on the Necessity and Advantage of Frequent Communion, first pub. 1708, 8vo. A Defence of Sternhold's, Hopkins's, &c., version of the Book of Psalms, 1710, 12mo. Exposition of the 39 Articles. The English works of Bishop Beveridge were for the first time collected and published in 9 vols. 8vo in 1824 by the Rev. Thomas Hartwell Horne. The greater part of the impression was destroyed by fire. Since the publication of this edit. the MS. of the Exposition of the last nine of the thirty-nine Articles was discovered, and edited by Dr. Routh. Another edit. was pub. in 12 vols. 8vo, Oxf., 1844-48; viz., vol. i.-vi., 1844-45, Sermons. Vol. vii., 1845, On the Thirty-nine Articles. Vol. viii., 1846, On the Church Catechism; Private Thoughts; On Public Prayer; On Frequent Communion; Defence of Sternhold and Hopkins's Psalms. Vol. ix., x., 1847, Thesaurus Theologicus. Vol. xi., xii., Codex canonum Ecclesiæ Primitivæ Vindicatus ac illustratus; Indices and Appendix. A more excellent person than Bishop Beveridge does not adorn the Faust of the English Church.

"Beveridge's Practical Works are much like Henry's, but not equal to his."—Dr. DODDARD.

"Beveridge was a very evangelical practical bishop, the chief of whose works had the great disadvantage of posthumous publication."—BICKERSTETH.

"Those who are censorious enough to reflect with severity upon the pious strains which are to be found in Bishop Beveridge, may possibly be good judges of an ode or essay, but do not seem to criticise justly upon sermons, or express a just value for spiritual things."—Dr. LUTTON.

"Our learned and venerable bishop delivered himself with those ornaments alone, which his subject suggested to him, and wrote in that plainness and solemnity of style, that gravity and simplicity, which gave authority to the sacred truths he taught, and unanswerable evidence to the doctrines he defended. There is something so great, primitive, and apostolical, in his writings, that it creates an awe and veneration in our mind; the importance of his subjects is above the decoration of words; and what is great and majestic in itself looketh most like itself, the less it is adorned."—Dr. HENRY FELTON.

The author of one of the "Guardians" makes an extract from one of the bishop's sermons, and remarks that "It may for acuteness of judgment, ornament of speech, and true sublimity, compare with any of the choicest writings of the ancients who lived nearest to the Apostles' times."

"Before Bevin's time the precepts for the composition of canons were known to few. Tallis, Bird, Waterhouse, and Farmer were eminently skilled in this most abstruse part of musical practice. Every canon, as given to the public, was a kind of enigma. Compositions of this kind were sometimes exhibited in the form of a cross, sometimes in that of a circle; there is now extant one resembling a horizontal sun-dial, and the resolution (as it was called) of a canon, which was the resolving it into its elements, and reducing it into score, was deemed a work of almost as great difficulty as the original composition."—Hawkins's Hist. of Music.

Bickersteth, Edward, 1786–1850, a native of Kirkby Lonsdale, practised as a lawyer in Norwich from 1812 to 1815. He took holy orders in the latter year, and became a zealous labourer in connection with The Church Missionary Society and other useful departments of Christian effort. He continued in London until 1830, when he was presented to the living of Walton, where he proved himself a most laborious and useful parish minister. He died at Walton in 1850. Mr. Bickersteth published a number of valuable theological works, some of which we proceed to notice. A uniform edition of his principal works, in 17 vols. 8vo, was pub. in 1853. It comprises Christian Truth, The Christian Student, Scripture Help, Treat. on the Lord's Supper, Treat. on Prayer, The Chief Concerns of Man, Family Expositions of the Epistles of St. John and St. Jude, Christian Hearers' Family Prayers, Signs of the Times in the East, Promised Glory of the Church, Restoration of the Jews, Practical Guide to the Prophecies, Treat. on Baptism, The Divine Warning to the Church, &c. To these 17 vols. must be added the 5 vols. of his smaller works.

The Scripture Help, designed to assist in reading the Bible profitably, has long proved a most useful manual:

"This work is professedly a practical introduction to the reading of the Scriptures. The sale of 30,000 copies of the large editions, and of more than 130,000 copies of the 12mo and 18mo abridgments, sufficiently attests the high estimation in which this manual is deservedly held. It has been translated and published in the French and modern Greek languages."—Horne's Introduction.

Since the above was written, a large number of copies have been sold. The Christian Student, designed to assist Christians in general in acquiring Religious Knowledge; with Lists of Books adapted to the various Classes of Society; 4th edit. corrected, 1844.

"A most valuable little work, to which the compiler of these pages is under the greatest obligations."—Lowndes's British Librarian.

A Discourse on Justification by Faith, &c., 1827.

"It is a plain, judicious, and practical discourse."—Lowndes.

A Treatise on the Lord's Supper.

"Seven editions of this popular and truly excellent treatise have been published. It is divided into two parts—the first is designed to explain the doctrines connected with that ordinance; and the second to assist the communicant in devoutly receiving it. It likewise forms a portion of the Christian's Family Library."

Mr. Bickersteth's Sermons are excellent. They are plain and simple; there is nothing ambitious or high-wrought about them, and they are throughout very scriptural."—Presb. Rev.

A Practical Guide to the Prophecies, with reference to their Interpretation and Fulfilment, and to Personal Edification, 6th edit. enlarged, Lon., 1839.

"A most trustworthy guide: it is the completest and most comprehensive manual upon the subject extant, and the tone in which it is written is altogether Christian. It forms an admirable textbook for the students of prophecy."—Lowndes.

"The fact that, within a few years, Mr. Bickersteth's Guide has reached a 6th edition, is of itself sufficient to prove the commanding attitude which it maintains. The popularity of the work, however, is in some measure to be attributed to the deservedly high standing of the pious and zealous author among the members of his own communion, and the deeply practical character with which he has succeeded in investing the topics of discussion. Bating this feature, which we cannot too highly commend, we are sorry in being obliged to give it as our opinion, that we consider the writer to have greatly retrograded in his views since last he came under our notice. He now believes in a premillennial personal advent of Christ, and that he will so dwell on earth as to be visible in his glory; and so important does he regard the doctrine, that he scruples not to designate it the generation truth. He expects a personal, visible, by which we suppose he means an individual, antichrist, to head the last apostasy. He is of opinion, that the Jews, when converted, are to be the eminently successful missionaries to the Gentiles, and are those for whom their universal conversion is reserved. He thinks that the first resurrection (Rev. xx.) is a literal rather than a spiritual one. He has given up the views which he formerly entertained respecting a merely spiritual and universal kingdom of Christ. His notions of Hades, p. 313, seem very different from what we believe he once taught respecting the glory of that state of blessedness to which believers are at death immediately admitted. Whatever edification its readers may derive from the pious tone and practical character of the book, certain we are, it will be found a very unsafe guide to the just apprehension of the meaning of Scripture prophecy."—Evangelical Mag., 1838.

sisting of Biog., Hist., Pract., and Devotional Works, Original and Selected. Mr. B. also edited The Harmony of the Gospels, Christian Psalmody, and the Walton Tracts.

"Mr. Bickersteth is justly entitled to rank among the most useful writers of the present day. His name is no inconsiderable recommendation of any work, and no slight security for its excellence."

Biddle, Charles J., b. 1819, at Philadelphia, son of Nicholas Biddle, served in the United States Army during the war with Mexico; wrote The Case of Major André, in Memoirs of Historical Society of Penna., vol. vi.: see MAHON, PHILIP HENRY, LORD, No. 3, p. 1204, (post.)

Biddle, Clement Cornell, 1784–1854, edited Political Economy, from the French of J. B. Say, by C. R. Prinsep, Bost., 1821, 2 vols. 8vo; last ed., Phila., 1851, 8vo. Commended by Dugald Stewart, 1824.

Biddle, John, 1615–1662, a noted Socinian writer, was born at Wootton-under-Edge, in Gloucestershire, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. After suffering imprisonment for his publications, he was banished by Cromwell to the castle at St. Mary's, one of the Scilly Islands. He was restored to liberty in 1658, and returned to London. When only 19 he pub. Virgil's Bucolicks Englished; whereunto is added The Translation of the First Two Satyrs of Juvenal, Lon., 1634, 8vo. In 1647 he pub. Twelve Arguments on Questions drawn out of the Scripture, wherein the commonly received Opinion touching the Deity of the Holy Spirit is clearly and fully Refuted, Lon., 4to. This work caused his imprisonment, and he was summoned to the bar of the House of Commons, by which a resolution was passed,

"That the house being acquainted with a blasphemous Pamphlet in print, entitled, &c. by John Biddle, Master of Arts, all printed copies should be seized and burned by the common hangman, in Chesapeake and at Westminster."

In 1648 he pub. A Confession of Faith touching the Holy Trinity, according to Scripture; for this and another work, The Testimony of the Fathers to these Doctrines, the author was sentenced to death. This sentence was not put in execution, but he was again imprisoned. The Confession of Faith was reviewed by Nic. Setwick, B.D., Lon., 1656, 4to. In 1654 he pub. A Brief Scripture Catechism, Lon., 8vo. This was answered by Dr. John Owen in his Vindiciæ Evangelicæ; or the Mystery of the Gospel Vindicated against the Socinians, &c., Oxf., 1655, 4to. Cloppenburgius also attacked Biddle in his Vindiciæ pro Deitate Spiritus Sancti; adversus Joan. Biddellum Anglum. Francof., 1652, 4to, etc. Biddle also pub. A Twofold Scripture Catechism, Lon., 1654, 12mo, and History of the Unitarians, also called Socinians, and some comments on the Revelation. See his Life by Rev. Joshua Toulmin, (1789, 8vo,) who styles him the Father of the English Unitarians.

"He had in him a sharp and quick judgment, and a prodigious memory; and being very industrious withal, was in a capacity of devouring all he read. He was wonderfully well versed in the Scriptures, and could not only repeat all St. Paul's epistles in English, but also in the Greek tongue, which made him a ready disputant. He was accounted by those of his persuasion a sober man in his discourses, and to have nothing of impetuosity, folly, or scurrility to proceed from him: Also, so devout, that he seldom or never prayed without being prostrate or flat on the ground."—Athen. Oxon.

Biddle, Nicholas, 1786–1844, a native of Philadelphia, and graduate of Princeton College, was an energetic member of the legislature of Pennsylvania, and held the post of President of the United States Bank from 1823 to 1839. Mr. Biddle's literary taste was of a high order. He edited for some time the Philadelphia Port-Folio, and contributed many articles to its pages. He compiled from the original papers a history of Lewis and Clarke's expedition to the Pacific Ocean, and prepared by request of the President of the United States a volume put forth by Congress, entitled Commercial Digest, &c. A number of his Essays, Speeches, &c. have been given to the world, and evince great vigour of mind and classical taste of no ordinary character. A well-written biographical sketch of Mr. Biddle, by Judge Robt. T. Conrad, of Phila., will be found in the American National Portrait Gallery.

A Memoir of Sebastian Cabot; with a Review of the History of Maritime Discovery, illustrated by Documents from the Rolls, now first published, Phila. and Lon., 1831, 8vo; Lon., 1832: anon.

"A most elaborate and successful examination into the records of the past, for the sake of doing justice to the character of an eminent man, whose merits have been strangely overlooked by most historians and biographers. The author has accomplished his task with signal ability, and has dispelled the darkness which prejudice and carelessness had suffered to gather over the fair fame of a great navigator." Bigelow, Andrew, of Massachusetts. Leaves from a Journal; or, Sketches of Rambles in some parts of North Britain and Ireland in 1817; Bost. 1821, 8vo.

"We have read these Sketches with great and increasing pleasure, and we know of few works of a similar character executed in a happier manner. The style is original, chaste, and classical; and the manner lively, buoyant, and what some critics would call refreshing. His Excursion from Edinburgh to Dublin will bear to be read over and over again with renewed pleasure and delight. So will also his Tour to Loch Katrine and the Grampians; his Visit to the Grave of Colonel Gardiner; his Pilgrimage to Melrose and Dryburgh Abbey; but particularly his Day in Lorn. The latter is exquisitely romantic; and whoever can read it without pleasure, can never hope to derive pleasure from works of a descriptive and romantic character."—European Magazine.

Bigelow, Timothy, 1767-1821, was a son of Colonel Timothy Bigelow, who served in Arnold's expedition to Quebec, and commanded the 16th regiment in the Revolutionary War. The subject of this notice was born at Worcester, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard College in 1786, and commenced the practice of the Law in 1789, at Groton. He was a prominent member of the legislature for more than 20 years, and for 11 years was the speaker of the House of Representatives.

"A learned, eloquent, and popular lawyer. It has been computed that during a practice of thirty-two years he argued not less than 15,000 cases. His usual antagonist was Samuel Dana. Over the assembly of six or seven hundred legislators of Massachusetts he presided with great dignity and energy."

He pub. an Oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, 1797. An Extract from his Eulogy on S. Dana is in the Historical Collection. See Allen's American Biog. Dict.; Jennison; Marine Hist. Coll., i. 363, 388, 409; Mass. Hist. Coll., s. a. ii. 235, 252.

"This book, which served her design for the present, did contribute much to the ruin of her successor, K. Ch. I. . . . To justify the revolt of Holland, Bilson gave strange liberty in many cases, especially concerning religion, for subjects to cast off their obedience. . . . Bindley, James, Senior Commissioner of the Stamp Office. Statutes Relating to the Stamp Duties, Lon., 1775, 4to. This gentleman is the LEONTE celebrated by Dr. Dibdin in his Bibliomania, and in the Bibliographical Decameron. He was noted for knowledge of books and his valuable Library. Mr. John Nichols paid him a deserved compliment by dedicating to him the most valuable collection of literary treasures in the language—Nichols's Literary Anecdotes. See NICHOLS, JOHN.

To the 1st edit. of this work Mr. Bindley was a contributor.

"LEONARDO. Gratify a curiosity that I feel to know the name and character of yonder respectfully-looking gentleman, in the dress of the old school, who is speaking in so gracious a manner to Bernardo."

"The LEONTE: a man of taste, and an accomplished antiquary. Even yet he continues to gratify his favourite passion for book and print collecting; although his library is at once choice and copious, and his collection of prints exquisitely fine. . . . Like Atticus [Richard Heber, Esq.] he is liberal in the loan of his treasures; and, as with him, so 'tis with Leonte—the spirit of book-collecting 'assumes the dignity of a virtue.' Peace and comfort be the attendant spirits of Leonte, through life and in death: the happiness of a better world await him beyond the grave! His memory will always be held in reverence by honest bibliomaniacs."—Bibliomania, ed. 1842, 133.

Some six years later Dibdin again notices this worthy character:

"Dear as the ruddy drops that warm my heart are the name and the virtues of Leonte! That excellent and venerable character yet lives; lives in the increased estimation of his long-tried friends, and in the very plenitude and zenith of bibliomaniacal reputation. Can human felicity go beyond this? Rich in 'good works' as well as in good books. . . . Gaze therefore with respect and admiration upon the numerous and well-selected tomes of which the library of the venerable gentleman is composed; and wish that he who knows how to make such an excellent use of them, may yet live to complete his term of a 'thousand years.'"—Bibliographical Decameron, iii. 24, 412.

Binfield, Wm. Travels and Adventures, 2 vols. Lon., 1753.

Bingham, Caleb, of Boston, Massachusetts, was author of the Hunters; Young Lady's Accidence, 1789; Epistolary Correspondence; The Columbian Orator.

Bingham, George, 1715-1800, a native of Dorset, was educated at Westminster, and Christ Church, Oxford.

Being elected Fellow of All Souls' College, he formed an intimacy with William (afterwards Sir William) Blackstone, who assisted him in the preparation of his Stemmata Chichelliana. His principal works are a Vindication of the Doctrine and Liturgy of the Church of England, Oxf., 1774, 8vo. This was occasioned by Mr. T. Lindsey's Apology for Quitting his Living, Lon., 1774, 8vo. An Essay on the Millennium, &c., Lon., 1804, 2 vols. 8vo, and Essays, Disputations, and Sermons, to which are prefixed Memoirs of the Author's Life, by Peregrine Bingham, 1804, 2 vols. 8vo. These four vols. were pub. by his son. Also see Biographical Anecdotes of the Rev. John Bingham, being part of the Bib. Top. Brit., reprinted, with additions, 1813, 4to, and fol.

"It has been justly remarked to his honour and credit, that he never made an acquaintance by whom he was not highly respected, or formed an intimacy that was not permanent."

Bingham, Joseph, 1668-1723, the celebrated author of Origines Ecclesiasticæ, was a native of Wakefield in Yorkshire. In 1684 he was admitted a member of University College, Oxford. He took the degree of B. A. in 1688, M. A. in 1691. He was elected Fellow of his College in 1689. By the kindness of the eminent Dr. Radcliffe he was presented, upon resignation of his fellowship, to the rectory of Headbourn-Worthy in Hampshire, with about £100 a year. Some six or seven years after this event he married a daughter of Richard Pococke, grandfather of the celebrated author of the Description of the East. Feeling the great want which existed of a good work upon Ecclesiastical Antiquities, Bingham determined to endeavour to supply the void. His disadvantages were great: ill health, large family, small means, and almost without books. Fortunately the latter want was supplied by his opportunity of access to the excellent library of the cathedral church of Winchester, the bequest of Bishop Morley.

"Even this was deficient in many works to which he had occasion to refer; and yet when we turn to the Index Auctorum at the end of his work, we shall perhaps be astonished at the vast number of books which he appears to have consulted. But to such straits was he driven for want of books, that he frequently procured imperfect copies at a cheap rate, and then employed a portion of that time, of which so small a portion was allotted him, and which therefore could so ill be so spared, in the tedious task of transcribing the deficient pages; instances of which are still in being, and serve as memorials of his indefatigable industry on all occasions."

The author remarks:

"I confess that this work will suffer something in my hands for want of several books, which I have no opportunity to see, nor ability to purchase. The chief assistance I have hitherto had is from the noble beneficence of one, who being dead, yet speaketh; I mean the renowned Bishop Morley."

He pub. the 1st vol. (Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church) in 1708, and the 10th and last in 1722, 8vo. Whole works, 1726, 2 vols. fol. Translated into Latin, with the words of the quotations given by Grischovius, Halle, 1724-29, and again in 1751.

"The author left MS. corrections, which were incorporated in an edition edited by his great-grandson, in 8 vols. 8vo, 1829. Two editions have since that date appeared under the able editorship of the Rev. J. R. Pitman, in which the passages referred to are given in the original words. The Rev. Richard Bingham, son of the former editor, has prepared an edition which, when published, will be of great importance, as he has verified all the quotations, some of which had escaped the research of Grischovius and Mr. Pitman. An edition of the Ecclesiastical Antiquities only, as it originally appeared, is in print, in 2 vols. Imperial 8vo."—Darwin's Cyc. Bibliographica.

It is an interesting bibliographical incident that the valuable labours of Mr. Bingham should be revised by his great-great-grandson after a lapse of 130 years. Mr. Bingham also wrote: The French Church's Apology for the Church of England, &c., Lon., 1706, 8vo. A Scholastical History of Lay Baptism, two parts, Lon., 1712, 2 vols. 8vo. A Discourse concerning the Mercy of God to Penitent Sinners; and a Discourse on Absolution, in his Works, 2 vols. fol., 1726.

Before the publication of vols. ix. and x. of his Origines, Mr. Bingham was sorely tried by the conduct of a Mr. A. Blackmore, who pub. in 1722, 2 vols. 8vo, A Summary of Christian Antiquities, &c., which Mr. Bingham declared to be, for the most part, an abridgment of the 8 vols. upon which he had bestowed "Twenty years' hard labour." He thus discourses upon the matter in the preface to vols. ix. and x.:

"When I had finished these two volumes, and completed the whole work that I intended, and sent it to the press, hoping to give myself a little rest and vacation from hard labour, I was immediately called to a new work by a book that was sent me, bearing the title of Ecclesiæ Primitivæ Notitia in a Summary of Christian Antiquities. To which is prefixed an Index Hereticus containing a short account of all the principal heresies since the rise of Christianity; and subjoined A Brief Account of the Eight First General Councils, dedicated to the venerable Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, by A. Blackmore, in two volumes 8vo. Lon., 1722. I confess, I was very much surprised at first with the title and epistle dedicatory, thinking it to be some new work, that had done some mighty thing, either in correcting my mistakes, or supplying my deficiencies, after twenty years' hard labour in compiling my Origines for the use of the church. But as soon as I looked into the preface, and a little into the book itself, I found it to be only a transcript of some part of my Origines, under the notion of an epitome, though no such thing is said in the title-page. . . . If he had done it in a genteel way, by asking leave, and under direction, he should have had my leave and encouragement also. Or if he had done it usefully, so as truly to answer the end he pretends, even without leave, he should have my pardon. But now he has defeated his own design, both by unnecessary and hurtful additions of his own, which will not only incommode and encumber his books, but render them dangerous and pernicious to unwary readers, unless timely antidoted and corrected by some more skillful hand. For which reason, since they are sent into the world together with an abstract of my Antiquities, I have thought it just both to the world and myself to make some proper animadversions on them."

The justly indignant author then proceeds in a long bill of indictments to substantiate his charge. The grievance complained of was one to which all authors are liable, and the more meritorious their productions the greater the risk. Mr. Pitman's last edit., referred to before, was pub. in 1840, in 9 vols. 8vo. (See preceding notice of forthcoming edition, by the Rev. Richard Bingham.)

To those unacquainted with the value of the work, it may be useful to give an analysis of the Twenty-three Books, of which the Antiquities is composed:

1. Of Christianity in general; the Names and Orders of both Clergy and Laity.
2. The Laws of the First Councils.
3. Of the Inferior Clerical Laws.
4. Of the Election and Ordination of the Clergy; Qualifications, &c.
5. Clerical Privileges, Immunities, and Revenues.
6. The Laws and Rules of their Lives, Services, Behaviour, &c.
7. Of the Ascetics.
8. Of their Councils, Churches, &c.
9. Of the Divisions into Provinces, Dioceses, and Parishes; with the Origin of these Divisions.
10. Of the Catechisms, and first use of Creeds.
11. On the Administration of Baptism.
12. On Confirmation.
13. Of Divine Worship in the Ancient Congregations.
14. Of the Service of the Catechumens.
15. Of the Communion Service.
16. Of the Unity and Discipline of the Church.
17. Of the Exercise and Discipline among the Clergy.
18. Of the Penitential Laws and Rules for doing Public Penance.
19. Of Absolution.
20. On the Festivals.
21. On the Fasts.
22. On the Marriage Rites.
23. On the Funeral Rites.

With Four Dissertations. In the first three, those things only briefly described in his Antiquities are more fully explained. In the fourth, he defends the English Homilies, Liturgy, and Canons, from domestic adversaries, particularly the French Reformers.

The following testimonies, selected from numerous others which could be adduced, will serve to show the estimation in which he is generally held by all parties:

Auguste, in his Introduction to Handbuch der Christlichen Archaeologie, p. 11, (Leipzig, 1836,) says, after having spoken of some unsatisfactory works, "But the English Clergyman, Joseph Bingham, remarkable for his profound learning, and his spirit of unprejudiced inquiry, was the first who published a complete Archaeology, and one worthy of the name. His Origines or Christian Antiquities first appeared in London, 1708-22, in 10 parts, 8vo. Undoubtedly, the Latin translation by J. H. Grisevovius has very much contributed to the general spread of this classical work. While Bingham was still living, a countryman of his own, A. Blackmore, prepared an abridgment under the title of Summary of Christian Antiquities, Lon., 1722, with which Bingham was much displeased, it being published as an original work. At a later period another abridgment appeared by an anonymous Roman Catholic Theologian; J. Bingham's Christian Antiquities, an abridgment from the English edition, Augsburg, 1768-96. The work also called Lucii Paleotimi Antiquitatum S. Originum Ecclesiasticarum summa, Venet., 1766, is nothing more than an abridgment of Bingham's work, the usefulness of which for both confessions is strongly indicated by these repeated abridgments of it, as well as by the manifold use of it made in other writings."

"Most strongly and vehemently do I recommend Bingham's Antiquities of the Christian Church; he is justly ranks among our brightest church luminaries. Jordan knew the value of his labours; Gibbon stole from them, and they have been translated and revered all over the Continent."—DIDEROT.

"Opus ipsum Binghami tam egregium est, ut merito inter libros, quibus Antiquitates Ecclesiasticæ universæ enarratæ sunt, principatum teneat, sive ad rerum copiam atque apparatus; sive ad earum explanationem animam advertere volumus. Commendat illud se adorationi ordine, argumentis solidis; sive testimoniis, quæ ex ipsis fontibus hausta ac diligenter adducta sunt, perspicuitate atque aliis virtutibus. Ac quamvis auctor, his addictus, qui in Angliâ pro episcoporum auctoritate pugnant, ad horum sententias veteris ecclesiæ instituta trahat; animi tamen moderationem, quum in his rebus versatur, ostendit ac si quæ corrigenda sunt."—WALCHIN: Bibliotheca Theologica, vol. iii. p. 671.

The Lon. Quarterly Review, in an article on Christian Burial, says: "This is traced by Bingham with his usual erudition;" and in speaking of palmy in the early Christian Church, "of this Bingham produces abundant evidence." And again, in an article on the Architecture of Early Christian Churches, "much information on this subject is collected in the Origines Ecclesiasticæ of Bingham, a writer who does equal honour to the English clergy and to the English nation, and whose learning is to be equalled only by his moderation and impartiality."—Vols. xxi. xxvii. xxviii.

"Let Bingham be consulted where he treats of such matters as you meet with, that have any difficulty in them."—Dr. Waterland's Advice to a Young Student.

"This is an invaluable Treatise of Christian Antiquities, and deserves the first place in works of this kind: the plan and the execution do equal honour to the learning and industry of the author."—ORRIS: Bibliotheca Biblica.

"A vast body of information respecting the first Christian Churches, and full of valuable learning on the Early State of the Church."—BICKNAP.

"For the elucidation of the Antiquities of the Church, we cannot refer to a higher authority than that of Bingham. Joseph Bingham was born at Wakefield, in Yorkshire, September 1668, and graduated at University College, Oxford, 1683. He was presented by Dr. Radcliffe to the Rectory of Headbourn-Worthy, near Winchester; and there, having the use of the Cathedral Library, he commenced his celebrated work Origines Ecclesiasticæ, or the Antiquities of the Christian Church."—Voice of the Church.

It is also recommended to be studied by Bishops Tomline, Randolph, and Coleridge; by Dr. Burton, and in the Tracts for the Times published at Oxford.

"He who seeks for information upon any ecclesiastical subject, will be almost sure to find it in Bingham's Antiquities."—BISSHOP SHOOT.

Birch, Thomas. Sermons, 1720–29, 8vo.

Birch, Thomas, D.D., 1705–66, a native of Clerkenwell, received his education at Quaker schools, to which persuasion his parents were attached. He was ordained deacon in the Church of England, 1730, priest, 1731, by the Bishop of Salisbury, the celebrated Dr. Hoadly. To the friendship of this divine, he was no doubt indebted for several of his preferments. He was Vicar of Ulting, Essex, 1734; Rector of St. Margaret Pattens with St. Gabriel, Fenchurch-street, London, 1746; Secretary to the Royal Society, 1752; Rector of Depden, Essex, 1761. Dr. Birch was an industrious writer, as is evinced by his numerous publications. We shall notice some of the principal. His first literary undertaking was The General Dictionary, Historical and Critical, "in which a new and accurate translation of that of the celebrated Mr. Bayle, with the corrections and observations printed in the late edition at Paris, is included, and interspersed with several thousand lives never before published," &c., 10 vols. folio, Lon., 1734–41. In this laborious enterprise he was assisted by the Rev. John Peter Bernard, Mr. John Lockman, and others. The articles relating to Oriental history were allotted to Mr. George Sale, who was admirably qualified for the task. This Dictionary is certainly one of the most valuable compends of knowledge in the English language. It can be purchased at the present day (1854) for about £7 to £8. The editors give "Reflections upon such passages of Mr. Bayle as seem to favour skepticism and the Manichee system."

Bayle's faults in these and other respects are well known. Apart from such objections, he is a delightful companion, and his merits have been widely acknowledged:

"He is the only man that ever collected with so much judgment, and wrote with so much spirit at the same time."—POPE: Spencer's Anecdotes.

"If Bayle wrote his Dictionary to empty the various collections he had made without any particular design, he could not have chosen a better plan. By the double freedom of a Dictionary of Notes, he could pitch on what articles he pleased, and say what he pleased on these articles."—Gibbon.

"Gibbon's eulogy of Bayle is at once concise and just, and no one read him or loved him more than the eulogist himself. Bayle was a man of immense but desultory reading, of a subtle understanding, and of indomitable patience and industry. His Dictionary is as a Cornucopia of flowers, bright, blooming, and captivating."—DIDEROT.

"Bayle's Dictionary is a very useful work for those to consult who love the Biographical part of Literature, which is what I love most."—DR. JOHNSON.

In 1742, 7 vols. folio, Dr. Birch published Thurloe's Collection of State Papers, containing Authentic Memorials of English Affairs from 1638 to the Restoration of Charles II.

"In it will be found many important particulars of English History, which have escaped the researches of every historian, even the recent ones of Mr. Macaulay. . . . In its illustrations of the literary history of the time the work is extremely rich, abounding in anecdotes of Ben Jonson, Carey, Wither, Daniel, the Killigrews, Sir Henry Saville, Sir Robert Cotton, Camden, the brothers Shirley, the famous travellers Bacon, Sir Julius Caesar, Dr. Donne, Sir Henry Wotton, and many scholars of note, both at home and abroad. Added to these interesting features, the work contains notices of almost every person of celebrity in the kingdom, so that there is scarcely a family whose members have figured in the history of this portion of the seventeenth century, that will not find in these volumes some reference to their ancestors." "This work teaches us the elements of the entire circle of Natural Philosophy in the clearest and most perspicuous manner. Light, Magnetism, Dynamics, Meteorology, Electricity, &c. are set before us in such simple forms, and in so forcible a way, that we cannot help understanding their laws, their operation, and the remarkable phenomena by which they are accompanied or signified. As a volume of useful and beautiful instruction for the young, we cordially recommend it."—London Literary Gazette.

"By the appearance of Dr. Bird's work, the student has now all that he can desire in one neat, concise, and well-digested volume. The elements of natural philosophy are explained in very simple language and illustrated by numerous wood-cuts. . . . Bird, Robert Montgomery, M.D., 1803-1854, was a native of Newcastle, Delaware. He gave early indications of the uncommon powers of mind which distinguish his literary productions. Selecting the profession of medicine, after a due course of studies, he graduated at the University of Pennsylvania. He wrote for the stage the tragedies of The Gladiator, Oraloca, and The Broker of Bogota, which were highly successful. In 1834 he pub. Calavar, or the Knight of the Conquest, a Romance of Mexico. This work has been commended by an eminent authority in matters pertaining to Spanish-American History:

"The author has studied with great care the costume, manners, and military usage of the natives, and has done for them what Mr. Cooper has done for the wild tribes of the north,—taught their rude features with the bright colouring of a poetic fancy. He has been equally fortunate in his delineations of the picturesque scenery of the land, and if he has been less so in attempting to revive the antique dialogue of the Spanish cavalier, we must not be surprised, nothing is more difficult than the skillful execution of a modern antique."—W. H. PARMORE, in a note to his History of the Conquest.

"The scene is laid in Mexico, at the time of the invasion of Cortes, in 1520. The romantic incidents of that renowned conquest, when Spanish rule gained a steadfast footing upon the northern half of this continent, have furnished the materials of a fiction bordering closely upon the accuracy of history. With the exception of Prescott's magnificent annals of this period, we are not acquainted with any work from which so clear a conception of those times can be gathered as from Calvario. It is crowded with graphic descriptions and scenes of the most intense excitement. The author reveals among the varied vegetation of that sunny clime, and depicts the luxury of the black-eyed fair ones with a rhapsodist's enthusiasm."

In 1833 appeared The Infidel, or the Fall of Mexico. This is a sequel to the preceding work, although each is complete in itself. The Hawks of Hawk Hollow, a tradition of Pennsylvania, was pub. in the same year. Sheppard Lee appeared (anonymously) in 1838, and in the next year the publication of Nick of the Woods, or the Jibbamaunoy, gave fresh evidence of Dr. Bird's rapidity of composition. A collection of the author's contributions to periodicals was pub. in 1838, under the title of Peter Pilgrim, or a Rambler's Recollections. The last of his novels, The Adventures of Robin Day, was given to the world in 1838. After living in retirement for some years at Newcastle, Delaware, in 1847 Dr. Bird became associated with another gifted son of genius, Morton McMichael, (q. v.) as joint proprietor and editor of the (Philadelphia) North American and United States Gazette. In the columns of this journal, (January 24, 1854,) will be found an eloquent tribute by Mr. McM. to the memory of his departed friend. Dr. Bird was a man of great versatility of talent, and was equally familiar with the graver investigations of the exact sciences and the flowery paths of belles-lettres literature, to which he added no slight proficiency in the ornamental arts.

"He leaves behind him few of more vast and varied erudition, of a wider range of knowledge, practical as well as scholastic, not superficial and doubtful; but profound, positive, and accurate. As to these faculties a large comprehension, quickness, and power;—an imagination active as the principle of light, and a judgment unerring as mathematical demonstration;—and such was the intellectual condition of Dr. Bird."—MORTON McMICHAEL.

"Frederick Schlegel has more originality of genius than almost any other celebrated man in Germany: but, far from depending on that originality, though it promised him much success, he endeavours to assist it by extensive study. It is a great proof of our respect for the human species, when we dare not address it from the suggestions of our own minds, without having first conscientiously examined into all that has been left to us by our predecessors as an inheritance."—MADAME DE STAEL.

Black, John. Key to Mair's Introduction, 1818.

Black, Joseph, M.D., 1728-1799, an eminent chemist and physician, was the son of an Irish merchant who resided at Bordeaux when the subject of this notice was born. He entered the University of Glasgow in 1746, and became a favourite pupil of the celebrated Cullen, who instilled into his youthful mind that love of chemical investigations by which he afterwards became so highly distinguished. He took the degree of M.D. at Edinburgh in 1754, and won great credit for the ability displayed in his thesis—Dissertatio Medica de Humore Acido a Cibis orto, et Magnesia Alba. This paper, with a continuation written the next year, will be found in the Essays Physical and Literary, Edin., 1756. In this dissertation he "gave an account of one of the most important discoveries in chemistry, which is generally considered as the source of much that has immortalized the names of Cavendish, Priestley, and others, memorable for their acquisitions in the knowledge of aerial bodies. This was no other than the existence of an aerial fluid, which he denominated fixed air, the presence of which gave mildness, and its absence causticity, to alkalies and calcareous earths." His discoveries at a subsequent period with respect to water in various conditions, latent heat, cold, &c., (1762-91,) are well known to the profession. The theory of latent heat was undoubtedly a principal leading step to some of the grand discoveries made by Lavoisier, Laplace, and others; yet these chemists scarcely ever named Dr. Black in their dissertations; and Mr. Deluc had the impudence to claim the theory of latent heat as his own. In 1756 he was appointed to the chair of Chemistry and Anatomy at Glasgow, but the latter being distasteful to him, he exchanged it for that of Medicine. In 1766 he succeeded his old preceptor, Dr. Cullen, as Professor of Chemistry at Edinburgh. His lectures were so celebrated that few gentlemen left Edinburgh without having attended one course or more. At the time of his death, in 1799, he enjoyed the distinguished honour of being one of the eight foreign members of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. His Lectures on Chemistry were pub. from his MSS. by Dr. Robison, Edin., 1803, 2 vols. 4to. The Papers referred to above as pub. in the Essays Phys. and Lit., vol. ii. 157, were subsequently pub. in a 12mo vol. in Edin. The celebrated paper, The supposed effect of Boiling on Water in disposing it to freeze more readily, ascertained by experiment, will be found in Phil. Trans. Abr. xiii. 610, 1775, and the Analysis of the Waters of some Hot Springs in Iceland was pub. in Ed. Phil. Trans. iii. part 2, 95, 1794.

"Considered as a philosopher, Black ranks amongst the highest of those who have wrought out great theories. Induction was the only method by which he sought to discover truth. His character in this respect contrasts strongly with that of some other of our distinguished chemists."—British Quarterly Review, vol. ii.

"The discovery which he first made was the last of being completed. He never could be induced to publish an account of it to the world, notwithstanding the constant attempts of his rivals to deprive him of the claim. He was at all times averse to publication, and fastidious to an uncommon degree in his judgment of his own compositions."

Blackall, or Blackhall, Offspring, 1654-1716, was a native of London, and educated at Catherine Hall, Cambridge. He was made Bishop of Exeter in 1707. He engaged in several warm controversies with Toland and Bishop Hoadly; Bishop Offspring favouring the cause of Charles I. and high-church principles. Besides these pamphlets, he pub. 8 Sermons, 1700, 8vo; 15 do., 1706, 8vo; 14 do., 1706; some single discourses, and in 1717 his practical Discourses on the Sermon on the Mount were pub. in 8 vols. 8vo. His works were pub. in 1723, 2 vols. fol., with life by Archbishop Dawes.

This work elicited a warm controversy, which lasted for more than six years, and produced 70 to 80 pamphlets. Archbishop Secker was very anxious to see Blackburne confuted.

The 70 Weeks of Daniel, Lon., 1850, 8vo.

Blacklock, Thomas, 1721-1791, was a native of Annan in Scotland; his parents were English. When only six months old, he lost his sight by small-pox, and suffered under total blindness all his life. Notwithstanding this deprivation, he acquired a very respectable knowledge of Greek, Latin, French, Italian, Theology, and gained considerable distinction as an author. After a course of study at the University in Edinburgh, he was licensed as a preacher in the Church of Scotland in 1759, and in 1767 received the diploma of D.D. from Aberdeen. His first publication was a volume of Poems in 1754, Edin., 8vo, to which was prefixed an Account of his life, character, and writings, by his friend, the Rev. Joseph Spence, Professor of Poetry at Oxford. Mr. B. contributed to a Collection of Poems, pub. Edin., 1760, 12mo. Paraclesis, partly trans. from Cicero, appeared in 1767, Edin., 8vo. Two Discourses on the Spirit and Evidences of Christianity, from the French of Armand, 1768. He also pub. A Satirical Panegyric on Great Britain; The Graham, an Heroic Ballad; Remarks on the Nature and Extent of Liberty. In 1793 appeared Poems, together with an article on the Education of the Blind, (pub. in Encyc. Brit.) to which is prefixed A New Account of the Life and Writings of the Author, by Henry Mackenzie, Esq., 4to. In 1762 he married a lady who proved admirably calculated to promote his happiness.

"I have known him dictate from thirty to forty verses—and by no means bad ones—as fast as I could write them; but the moment he was at a loss for verse, or a rhyme, to his liking, he stopt altogether, and could very seldom be induced to finish what he had begun with so much ardour."—Statement of a friend.

"He never could dictate till he stood up; and as his blindness made walking about without assistance inconvenient or dangerous to him, he fell insensibly into a vibratory sort of motion with his body, which increased as he warmed with his subject and was pleased with the conceptions of his mind."—REV. JOSEPH SPENCE.

The attainments of Mr. Blacklock under so great a disadvantage as blindness are a standing rebuke to those "who having eyes see not," and pass through life with minds almost as much unfurnished as when they commenced their probation.

"Few men blessed with the most perfect sight can describe visual objects with more spirit and justness than this blind man."

—BURNS: Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful, which see.

"Dr. Johnson talked of Mr. Blacklock's poetry, so far as it was descriptive of visible objects; and observed, that, as his author had the misfortune to be blind, we may be absolutely sure that such passages are combinations of what he has remembered of the works of others who could see. That foolish fellow, Spence, has laboured to explain philosophically how Blacklock may have done, by means of his own faculties, what it is impossible he should do. The solution, as I have given it, is plain. Suppose I know a man to be so lame he is absolutely incapable to move himself, and I find him in a different room from that in which I left him; shall I puzzle myself with idle conjectures, that perhaps his nerves have by some unknown change all at once become effective? No, sir, it is clear how he got into a different room; he was carried."—Boswell's Johnson.

Blackmore, Sir Richard, M.D. d. 1729, the son of an attorney in Wilts, matriculated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, in 1668. He was knighted by William III., to whom he was appointed in 1697 physician in ordinary. His publications were numerous: we notice some of the principal. His first work, Prince Arthur, an Heroic Poem, appeared in 1695, and three editions were called for in less than two years.

"'Tis strange that an author should have a gamester's fate, and not know when to give over. Had the city-bard stopped his hand at Prince Arthur, he had missed knighthood, 'tis true, but he had gone off with some applause."—T. Brown's Works, vol. iv. 118.

In 1700 he pub. Paraphrases on Job, the Songs of Moses, Deborah, and David, and on 4 Select Psalms, chapters of Isaiah, and 3d chap. of Habakkuk. The excellent Matthew Henry quotes more frequently from Blackmore in his commentaries than from any other poet. In the same year he pub. a Satyr against Wit, which so offended the poets of the day, that in T. Brown's Works there are more than 20 satirical pieces against Blackmore. One of his assailants joins him to Bentley, thus:

"A monument of dullness to erect,
Bentley should write and Blackmore should correct.
Like which no other piece can e'er be wrought,
For decency of style and life of thought,
But that where Bentley shall in judgment sit,
To pare excrescences from Blackmore's wit."

Sir Richard might sit very easily under a lash which was aimed also at the great master of classical learning. Dryden declared that Sir Richard wrote his poetry to the "rumbling of his chariot wheels," and waspish little Pope gave him a place in that convenient pillory—the Dunciad. In 1713 he commenced a periodical called The Lay Monk; only 40 numbers appeared. Not forgetting his profession, he gave to the world a number of medical works, viz.: On the Plague and Malignant Fevers, 1720; The Small Pox, 1722; Consumption, &c., 1724; Spleen and Vapours, 1725; Gout, Rheumatism, and King's Evil, 1726; Dropsy, Stone, &c., 1727. His principal work, Creation, a Philosophical Poem, appeared in 1712, and reached its 4th edit. in 1718. This poem has been much admired. Ambrose Philips told Mr. Draper, who told Dr. Johnson, (see Lives of the Poets,) that

"Blackmore, as he proceeded in this poem, laid his MS. from time to time before a club of wits, with whom he associated; and that every man contributed, as he could, either improvement or correction: so that there are perhaps nowhere in the book thirty lines together that now stand as they were originally written."

This relation may be received with great doubt. Denon speaks of The Creation in glowing terms:

"A philosophical poem which has equalled that of Lucretius in the beauty of its verification, and infinitely surpassed it in the solidity and strength of its reasoning."

Addison's praise might well be coveted by any poet:

"It deserves to be looked upon as one of the most useful and noble productions in our English verse. The reader cannot but be pleased to find the depths of philosophy enlivened with all the charms of poetry, and to see so great a strength of reason, amidst so beautiful a redundancy of the imagination."—Spectator, No. 339.

"It wants neither harmony of numbers, accuracy of thought, nor elegance of diction: it has either been written with great care, or, what cannot be imagined of so long a work, with such felicity as made care less necessary."—Dr. Johnson.

In addition to his other titles to respect, Sir Richard had that ornament without which all other advantages are of little account—he was a man of humble and devoted piety.

Blackstone, Sir William, 1723-1780, was the fourth son of Charles Blackstone, a silkman in London. He was placed in the Charter-house School in 1730, and at the age of fifteen was admitted a Commoner of Pembroke College, Oxford. November 20th, 1741, he entered the Middle Temple. Determined to devote himself to the duties of his profession, he bade adieu to the more flowery paths of literature in those well-known verses, The Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse, subsequently pub. in vol. 4th of Dodsley's Collection. In Nov., 1743, he was elected into the society of All Souls' College; June 12th, 1745, he commenced Bachelor of Civil Law; on the 28th Nov., 1746, he was called to the bar, and April 26th, 1750, he commenced Doctor of Civil Law. It may be some encouragement to young lawyers to remember that the talents even of Blackstone were at first so much overlooked, that his limited business failed to cover his very moderate expenses; he therefore resolved to retire from the apology for a practice which he possessed, and support himself by his Fellowship and private lecturing. Accordingly, in Michaelmas Term, 1753, he commenced reading two Lectures on the Laws of England to a large and interested auditory. In order to render the duties of his class less difficult, he pub. (1756) an Analysis of the Laws of England, which proved of great service to a comprehension of the subject. He had already made his appearance as an author in his Essay (1750) on Collateral Consanguinity, which had reference to the claims for Fellowships in All Souls' College based upon asserted connexion with the founder, Archbishop Chicheley. In 1756, Charles Viner, the compiler of an Abridgment of Law and Equity, (see VINER,) died, and bequeathed the sum of £12,000 to the University of Oxford for the establishment of a Law Professorship, and the endowment of Fellowships and Scholarships in Common Law. On the 20th Oct., 1758, Blackstone was unanimously elected the first professor, with a salary of £200. His introductory Lecture produced a most favourable impression, and the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of Houses requested him to publish it. This Lecture will be found prefixed to vol. i. of the Commentaries. The fame of his Lectures reached the ears of George III., then Prince of Wales, who tendered him an invitation to read them to him. His engagements prevented his complying with this flattering request, but he transmitted some specimens to the prince, who begged his acceptance of a handsome token of his approbation. In 1759 he resumed practice in London, visiting Oxford at the periods appointed for his Lectures. In the preceding year he edited a magnificent edition of Magna Charta and the Forest Charter. Of this work Professor Smyth remarks:

"Of his History of the Charters it is in vain to attempt any abridgment; for such is the precision of his taste, and such the importance of the subject, that there is not a sentence in the composition that is not necessary to the whole, and that should not be perused. Whatever other works may be read slightly, or omitted, this is one the entire meditation of which can in no respect be dispensed with. The claims which it has on our attention are of no common nature. The labour which this eminent lawyer has bestowed on the subject is sufficiently evident."—Lectures on Modern History.

In 1761 he was elected to Parliament for the borough of Hindon; and in the same year had a patent of precedence granted to him to rank as King's Counsel, having declined the office of Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland. Vacating his Fellowship by marriage, he was appointed Principal of New Inn Hall, and in 1763 received the appointment of Solicitor to the Queen. In 1770 he was made one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, which office he held for the remaining ten years of his life. As many imperfect and incorrect copies of his Lectures were in circulation in MS. among the profession, and a pirated edition was understood to be in the press, the author determined to give a correct copy to the world. The Commentaries on the Laws of England were, therefore, pub. in 4 vols. 4to, Oxf., 1765-68. This great work at once superseded the standard manuals—Finch's Law, Wood's Institutes, &c. Enemies, however, were not wanting to attack the Commentaries on account of the conservative tone which was charged upon them by the "reformers" of the day. Jeremy Bentham pub. in 1776 his Comment upon the Commentaries, and censures the "antipathy to reformation" which he discovered in Blackstone's volumes. This objection is happily answered by Mr. Roscoe, who remarks that

"Blackstone did not profess to be a censor, but merely an expounder, of the law."

"His object was, in fact, to show what the Law of England was, not what it ought to be."—Cunningham's Biog. Hist.

Dr. Priestley also pub. some Remarks on the 4th volume, which were answered by Blackstone, 1769, 8vo. Blackstone also pub. Considerations on Copy Holders, and some other legal treatises, Reports, &c., and is author of a vindication of Addison respecting his misunderstanding with Pope, in the Biog. Brit. See ADDISON. A list of editions, abridgments of the Commentaries, etc., will be found in Lowndes's Bibliographer's Manual; consult also Anthon, Ayres, Bentham, Curry, Field, Furneux, Priestley, Rowe, Sedgwick, Warren, Marvin, &c. We observe by the catalogue of Messrs. Longman, Brown, Green, and Longman, November, 1853, that they advertise as in preparation the twenty-third edition, including the alterations to the present time, edited by James Stewart, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn. It will not be expected that we should enter into an examination of the merits of the annotations of the many distinguished legal authors who have profitably exercised their profound learning and critical acumen in the illustration of Blackstone. Messrs. Burn, Williams, Christian, Archbold, Coleridge, Chitty, Curry, Gifford, Field, Wanoetrocht, Taylor, Rowe, Stephen, Stewart, &c., deserve honourable mention whenever the name of the great Commentator occurs. Not only the members of the profession are debtors to these gentlemen, but for their labours the gratitude of the public at large is eminently due. As we have had occasion to remark in another place, so long as it is not "possible" to "live peaceably with all men"—so long as there are rights to be vindicated, wrongs to be redressed, boundaries to be defined, and property to be secured—so long shall we need the legal profession to be "with us." As every one, therefore, is liable to personal experience of, and serious suffering from, the indecision of the bench, the perplexities of the bar, and the ignorance and prejudice of the juries, so every one can perceive the value of those compilations by which forensic wisdom is placed upon record, and the philosophy of jurisprudence, illustrated by the expositions of its most profound sages, occupies the "seat of Gamaliel" for the instruction of mankind. The perusal of Blackstone and his Commentators, besides the other advantages offered to the intelligent mind, will hardly fail to produce one valuable result. It will expose the absurdity of that popular cant—so common with conceited ignorance—which would advise us to cashier our lawyers, and give the law-calf of our libraries to the flames. The settlement of rights, the ascertainment of duties, and the various issues proceeding therefrom, must ever constitute a science, with its code of laws and corps of professors, so long as it is preferable to have established principles which shall rule individual cases, to an endless litigation upon isolated instances. We can hardly close this article, long as it is, with propriety, without citing the opinions of some eminent authorities upon a work which (though not faultless) can only perish in the general wreck of the recorded wisdom of the world:

"Correct, elegant, unembarrassed, ornamented, the style is such as could scarce fail to recommend a work still more vicious in point of matter to the multitude of readers. He it is, in short, who, first of all institutional writers, has taught jurisprudence to speak the language of the scholar and the gentleman; put a polish upon that rugged science; cleansed her from the dust and cobwebs of the office; and if he has not enriched her with that precision which is drawn only from the sterling treasury of the sciences, has decked her out, however, to advantage, from the toilet of classical erudition; enlivened her with metaphors and allusions; and sent her abroad in some measure to instruct, and in still greater measure to entertain, the most miscellaneous, and even the most fastidious, societies. The merit, to which, as much perhaps as to any, the work stands indebted for its reputation, is the enchanting harmony of its numbers: a kind of merit that of itself is sufficient to give a certain degree of celebrity to a work devoid of every other: so much is man governed by the ear."—JEREMY BENTHAM: Fragment on Government.

"You, of course, read Blackstone over and over again; and, if so, pray tell me whether you agree with me in thinking his style of English the very best among our modern writers; always easy and intelligible, far more correct than Hume, and less studied and made up than Robertson."—C. J. Fox, in a letter to Mr. Trotter.

"His purity of style I particularly admire. He was distinguished as much for simplicity and strength as any writer in the English language. He was perfectly free from all Gallicisms and ridiculous affectations, for which so many of our modern authors and orators are so remarkable. Upon this ground, therefore, I esteem Judge Blackstone; but as a constitutional writer he is by no means an object of my esteem."—C. J. Fox's Debate on the admission of Lord Ellenborough into the Cabinet. See Cunningham's Biog. History.

We refer the reader to the article Blackstone in Marvin's Legal Bibliography, from which, and the opinions there quoted, we shall make some extracts:

"Probably there is not a treatise mentioned in the whole Bibliography of the common law, about which a greater contrariety of opinion has existed than of Blackstone's Commentaries. Soon after their publication the controversy began, and from that time to the present these volumes, on the one hand, have been most acrimoniously and unjustly criticised, and, on the other, inordinately and injudiciously praised. Impertinent and unfair criticism will no more guide us to a proper opinion of the value of a production, than over-zealous and indiscriminate praise. Did we believe the former, Blackstone is an immethodical, uninformed writer, whose Commentaries 'contain somewhat which is not law upon almost every page.' Did we believe the latter, his Commentaries are unsurpassed models of method, precision, and clearness, which should be perused iterum otque iterum. All are, however, agreed, that they are written in a nervous, elegant, and pellucid style; models of logical purity of diction. Before the time of Sir Matthew Hale, the Common Law was considered as incapable of system, by reason, it was said, of the indigestibility of it, and the multiplicity of the cases; but Hale was not of this opinion, and by his Analysis fully showed how capable the subject was of method and system. On this foundation Blackstone built his immortal work."

Mr. Austin is very severe upon our authors:

"The method observed by Blackstone in his too celebrated Commentaries, is a slavish and blundering copy of the very imperfect method which Hale delineated roughly in his short and unfinished Analysis. From the outset to the end of his Commentaries, he blindly adopts the mistakes of his rude and compendious model; missing invariably, with a nice and surprising infelicity, the pregnant but obscure suggestions which it proffered to his attention, and which would have guided a discerning and inventive writer to an arrangement comparatively just. Neither in the general conception nor in the detail of his book, is there a single particle of original and discriminating thought. He had read somewhat, (though far less than is commonly believed,) but he had swallowed the matter of his reading without choice and without rumination."—Outline of a Course of Lectures, 63.

"Perhaps no professional writer has suffered more from the seal of injudicious admirers than Blackstone in his celebrated Commentaries. They were not designed for students at law, but for students at the University; they were not addressed to professional, but to unprofessional, readers. He was not a lecturer of an Inn of Court, but a University professor—not to inform lawyers, but to render the law intelligible to the uninformed minds of beginners. Addressing himself to persons of this description, like an experienced actor, he accommodated himself to the temper and character of his audience, rather for effect than with a view to demonstrate. Like the gronon upon the sun-dial, he takes no account of any hours but the serene. A man may read Blackstone's Commentaries from one end to the other, and yet have no notion that a proposition in law is as capable of being resolved and demonstrated as a proposition in mathematics. In the rank of elementary composition they might forever have reposed beneath undisturbed laurels; but he who would make them the institute of his professional education imprudently forces them into an element which is not their own, and lays the foundation for those perilous misunderstandings—that unlaywer-like, jejune smattering, which informs without enlightening, and leaves its deluded votary at once profoundly ignorant and contented."—Risso's Law Education, 30, 76. "Good authority." "The Commentaries are still quoted, and as frequently as ever in the Courts of Law and Equity; if possible, with increased respect for the value of Blackstone's opinions, and of the evidence which his pages afford, of the former state of the law."—Warrren's Law Studies, 776; 4 Durm. & East, 311; American Reports, passim.

"The Commentaries contain a thousand sophistries, dangerous to the principles which every citizen of our free republic ought, and every professor of our laws is sworn, to maintain."—Shawson on Order and Com. Law, 6.

"Blackstone's Commentaries are a wonderful work, and the more a lawyer reads and studies the more he will appreciate them; it is not with him we find fault, but with those who blindly copy him even in his errors, who seem to think nothing in him can be wrong, nothing improved upon."—2 L. M., 62.

"I recommend the Commentaries of Blackstone as a general book. The intention of that ingenious writer was to give a comprehensive outline; and when we consider the multiplicity of doctrine which he embraced, the civil, the criminal, the theoretical and practical branches of the law, we must confess the hand of a master. But in the minutiae he is frequently, very frequently, inaccurate. He should, therefore, be read with caution. The student in reading him, will often require explanation from him whose duty it is to instruct."—Watkins's Prin. of Osmoregencing Int., 28.

"Blackstone's manner is clear and methodical; his sentiments, I speak of them generally, are judicious and solid; his language is elegant and pure. In public law, however, he should be consulted with a cautious prudence. But even in public law, his principles, when they are not proper objects of imitation, will furnish excellent materials of contrast. On every account, therefore, he should be read and studied. He deserves to be much admired; but he ought not to be implicitly followed."—Wilson's Works, 22.

"Till of late I could never with any satisfaction to myself, point out a book proper for the perusal of a student; but since the publication of Mr. Blackstone's Commentaries, I can never be at a loss."—LORD MANSFIELD: Holidays's Life, 89.

We conclude our notice of this eminent lawyer by citing the opinion of Professor Smyth of Cambridge:

"De Lolme is too much of a panegyrist upon our constitution, as indeed is Blackstone,—not to say that the latter is rather a lawyer than a constitutional writer. Blackstone is quite inferior to himself, when he becomes a political reasoner; and if he had lived in our own times, he would not have written (he could not have written, a man of such capacity) in the vague and even superficial manner in which he has certainly done, on many of such occasions. In his great work of the Commentaries. . . . However distinguished for his high endowments and extensive acquirements, and however impressed with a sense of the advantages to be derived from a free government, he has certainly never been considered as a writer very particularly anxious for the popular part of the constitution."—Lectures on Modern History.

We are pleased to learn that one of the most profound jurists and intelligent expositors of Civil and Statute Law of whom America can boast, is now engaged upon an edition of Blackstone, prepared with especial reference to the wants of the American student. Judge Sharwood has long devoted himself to the diligent study of his favourite author, and from his intimate acquaintance with the text, and familiarity with the general principles of jurisprudence, we confidently anticipate a work which will claim a conspicuous place in the American legal library, and be a valuable addition to the collection of the intelligent layman.

Blackwall, Anthony, 1674-1730, of Emanuel College, Cambridge, Lecturer of All-Hallows in Derby. His principal work was, The Sacred Classics Defended and Illustrated; or An Essay humbly offered towards proving the purity, propriety, and true eloquence of the Writers of the New Testament, Lon., 1725, '27, '31, 3 vols. 8vo. The same in Latin by Wollius, Lips., 1736, 4to.

"This work gives many well-chosen instances of passages in the classics which may justify many of those in Scripture that have been accounted solecisms."—DR. DODDRIEDGE.

"Blackwall was a strenuous advocate for the purity of the Greek style of the New Testament, which he vindicates in his first volume. The second volume, which is most valuable, contains many excellent observations on the division of the New Testament into chapters and verses, and also on various readings."—T. H. HORNE.

"It cannot be denied, that Blackwall has brought a large portion of learning, and no small portion of genius, to this work; but every attentive reader must be sensible that he often falls in making out his point."—ORME.

"It is allowed, that this work, without establishing the particular aim of the writer, gives light to many passages."—BICKERSTETH.

"Blackwall's plan is like comparing the proclamations of a king with the eloquent speeches of an orator; or an edifying popular hymn with the awful and pompous ode of a poet laureat."—DR. WILLIAMS.

"It cannot be denied that there is a considerable degree of affectation in Dr. Blackwell's style and manner of composition; and unhappily this affectation increased in him as he advanced in years. His Enquiry into the Life of Homer was not free from it: it was still more discernible in his Letters concerning Mythology, and was most of all apparent in his Memoirs of the Court of Augustus." "The occasion of his writing this book, which consists of Prayers and Devotions upon Divine Subjects, was, That he usually read the most of the Night, and had thereof so weakened his Eyes, that he could hardly know his children if they were but ten foot distant from him: for which the Archbishop [of Glasgow, James Beaton] advised him to a more useful and safe way to employ his Time, which was in frequent and fervent Prayers to God."—Mackenzie's Scotch Writers.

Bladen, Lt. Col. Martin, d. 1748, a member of Parliament, served under his former schoolfellow, the Duke of Marlborough, and dedicated to him his translation of the Works of Cæsar, Lon., 1719, 8vo. He was also author of two dramatic pieces, Solon, and Orpheus and Eurydice; which were pub. in 1705, without his consent. The learned Mr. Bowyer was employed to print Bladen's trans. of Cæsar; and as was his wont when he noticed errors and defects, he made many valuable corrections in the work. Upon one of these passages he consulted the eminent scholar, Jeremiah Markland, who returned him the following amusing reply, which Bladen would hardly have relished:

"I think in all my life I never saw such a translation as that you have sent me of these lines. If I were in your place, I would leave it just as it is. You will have an infinite deal of trouble, without any reward, or so much as thanks from those whose affair it is: perhaps, just the contrary. "The chapter on morbid anatomy forms a rich and most valuable section in the book. We have perused its elaborate details with much interest, and we only refrain from quotation because every line seems equally important. Dr. Blair is deserving of all praise for the enthusiasm with which he has studied the subject; and he has, in these careful directions, performed an onerous but high service, in presenting to the reader so much sterling information. . . . Blair, Hugh, D.D., 1718–1800, a native of Edinburgh, entered the University of that city in 1730. In this seat of learning he devoted himself to scientific, literary, and theological studies for the long term of eleven years. He took his degree of A.M. in 1739; was licensed to preach in 1741, and in 1757 received the degree of D.D. from the University of St. Andrew's. In 1742 he received a presentation to the parish of Collessie in Fife, which he left in the next year to fill a vacancy which had occurred in the second charge of the Canongate of Edinburgh. After discharging the duties of this post for eleven years, he was translated in 1754 to Lady Yester's, one of the city churches. Four years after this translation he was honoured by promotion to the High Church of Edinburgh, where he remained until his death in 1800. In 1759 he read in the college at Edinburgh a course of lectures on Composition, which excited so much admiration that in 1762 George III. was pleased to

"Erect and endow a Professorship of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the University of Edinburgh, and to appoint Dr. Blair, in consideration of his approved qualifications, Regius Professor thereof, with a salary of £70."

In 1783, when he resigned his professorship, he pub. his Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, Lon., 2 vols. 4to. Many editions have been pub. of these celebrated Lectures.

"The author gives them to the world, neither as a work wholly original, nor as a compilation from the writings of others. On every subject contained in them, he has thought for himself."—Preface.

"Their merit lies in their good taste and the elaborate elegance of the language."—WILLIAM SPALDING, Professor of Logic, Rhetoric, and Metaphysics in the University of St. Andrew's.

"They contain an accurate analysis of the principles of literary composition, in all the various species of writing: a happy illustration of those principles by the most beautiful and apposite examples, drawn from the best authors, both ancient and modern; and an admirable digest of the rules of elocution, as applicable to the oratory of the pulpit, the bar, and the popular assembly. . . . So useful is the object of these lectures, so comprehensive their plan, and such the excellence of the matter they contain, that, if not the most splendid, they will, perhaps, prove the most durable monument of their author's reputation."

An amusing conversation between Dr. Johnson and Boswell respecting these Lectures, will be found in Boswell's Life of Johnson.

Dr. Blair took great interest in "rescuing from oblivion the poems of Ossian." His biographer assures us that it was by the solicitation of Dr. Blair and John Home, (author of Douglas), that Macpherson was induced to publish his Fragment of Ancient Poetry. To "these, in 1763, Blair prefixed a Dissertation of the critical kind which procured him much reputation, whatever may be thought of the subject." See MACPHERSON. We cannot better introduce the mention of the celebrated sermons by which Blair is best known to the world, than by an extract from Boswell's Life of Johnson:

"The Reverend Hugh Blair, who had long been admired as a preacher at Edinburgh, thought now of diffusing his excellent sermons more extensively and increasing his reputation, by publishing a collection of them. He transmitted the manuscript to Mr. Strahan, the printer, who, after keeping it for some time, wrote a letter to him, discouraging the publication. Such, at first, was the unpropitious state of one of the most successful theological books that has ever appeared. Mr. Strahan, however, had sent one of the sermons to Dr. Johnson for his opinion; and after his unfavourable letter to Dr. Blair had been sent off, he received from Johnson on Christmas-eve, a note in which was the following paragraph:

"I have read Dr. Blair's first sermon with more than approbation: to say it is good, is to say too little."

Thus encouraged, Strahan and Cadell purchased the 1st vol. for £100, which they voluntarily doubled on account of "the rapid and extensive sale." For vol. 2d they gave the author £300, and for vol. 3d £600. The whole series comprises 5 vols. 8vo, 1777-1800. The reader will find frequent mention of the sermons and their author in Boswell's Life of Johnson:

"Dr. Blair is printing some sermons. If they are all like the first, which I have read, they are sermons aurei, ac auro magis auri. It is excellently written both as to doctrine and language. . . . Please to return Dr. Blair thanks for his sermons. The Scotch write English wonderfully well. . . . Dr. Blair's sermons are now universally commended; but let him think that I had the honour of first finding and first praising his excellencies. I did not stay to add my voice to that of the public."—Letters to Boswell in 1777.

"I read yesterday Dr. Blair's sermon on devotion, from the text, 'Cornelius, a devout man.' His doctrine is the best limited, the best expressed: there is the most warmth without fanaticism, the most rational transport. . . . A noble sermon it is, indeed. I wish Blair would come over to the Church of England. . . . I love Blair's sermons. Though the dog is a Scotchman, and a Presbyterian, and every thing he should not be, I was the first to praise him. Such was my candour (smiling). MRS. BOSWELL: 'Such his great merit, to get the better of all your prejudice.' 'Why, Madam, let us compound the matter; let us ascribe it to my candour, and his merit.'"

Such was the popularity of Blair's Sermons, that it has been declared to exceed "all that we read of in the history of literature. . . . They circulated rapidly and widely wherever the English tongue extends; they were soon translated into almost all the languages of Europe." Not the least pleasing evidence of approbation was a pension, conferred by royal mandate, of £200 per annum, which the successful preacher enjoyed until his death. It is needless to say that the popularity of Blair's sermons has long since passed away. Whilst praised by some, irrespective of their great merit as literary compositions, for that avoidance of doctrinal character which could not fail to displease many readers, it is urged on the other hand that there is hardly sufficient of the spirit of Christianity to elevate them above the rank of mere moral essays.

"A low tone of divinity, once popular," is the only notice which Mr. Bickersteth deigns to take of productions once so eagerly perused and clamorously applauded.

"They excel in perspicuity of arrangement and expression, but are too stiff, artificial, and elaborate for models of pulpit eloquence, independent of the strain of doctrine."—DR. E. WILLIAMS.

"We cannot deny the absence of every beauty, as well as of most faults in Blair. . . . His florid and artificial elegance obtained, without question, most extensive popularity; but it is very doubtful whether his hearers would have been attracted by any other writer; whether they would not have rejected a more energetic and impressive style as irregular and enthusiastic."—Lon. Quarterly Review.

"The merits of Blair (by far the most popular writer of sermons within the last century) are, plain good sense, a happy application of scriptural quotation, and a clear, harmonious style, richly tinged with scriptural language."—Edinburgh Review.

"Their character is that of moral discourses, but as such they never could have attained their popularity without that high polish of style which was the author's peculiar object. Under this are concealed all the defects which attach to them as sermons, a name which they can never deserve when compared with the works of the most eminent English and Scotch divines."

The elaborate review of Blair's Sermons by John Foster deserves the careful perusal of every one who can appreciate purity of style and elegance of diction. The celebrated discourses are castigated without mercy; perhaps without proper allowance for that difference in philosophical taste and construction of sentences which we witness in the literature of perhaps every succeeding generation. Mr. Foster charges that,

"In the first place, with respect to the language, though the selection of words is proper enough, the arrangement of them in sentences is often in the utmost degree stiff and artificial. It is hardly possible to depart further from any resemblance to what is called a living or spoken style, which is the proper diction at all events for popular addresses, if not for all the departments of prose composition. Instead of the thought throwing itself into words, by a free, instantaneous, and almost unconscious action, and passing off in that easy form, it is pretty apparent there was a good deal of handicraft employed in getting ready proper cases and trusses, of various but carefully measured lengths and figures, to put the thoughts into, as they came out, in very slow succession, each of them cooled and stiffened to numbness in waiting so long to be dressed. . . . In the second place, there is no texture in the composition. The sentences appear often like a series of little independent propositions, each satisfied with its own distinct meaning, and capable of being placed in a different part of the train, without injury to any mutual connection, or ultimate purpose, of the thoughts. The ideas relate to the subject generally, without specifically relating to one another."

Mr. Foster then proceeds with no gentle hand to apply the dissecting knife to other limbs of this body of divinity, if we may so call it. Indeed it is the want of an animus, such as the preacher's vocation would naturally lead us to expect, which he pathetically deplores. Yet whilst some serious defects may be willingly admitted, the sermons of Blair possess merits of a substantial and enduring kind; and though now apparently dead and known to the many "only by reputation," yet have they sufficient vitality to insure a resurrection; and our children will agree with their grandfathers in applauding and improving by those classical disquisitions which they will marvel their parents should ever have neglected.

Blair, James, d. 1743, a learned divine of the Scottish Episcopal Church, founder and first President of William and Mary College, Virginia, was born and educated in Scotland. About 1685 Compton, the Bishop of London, sent him as a missionary to Virginia; in 1689 he appointed him Ecclesiastical Commissary, and his confidence in Blair was justified by the piety, energy, and unwearied ministerial labours of the latter. In 1693 he returned to London in order to obtain the patronage of government for his projected college. He obtained a charter, and was appointed president, which office he held until his death. He was rector of a church in Williamsburg, Virginia, and President of the Council in that colony. He pub. Our Saviour's Sermon on the Mount, Matt. v., etc., explained in 117 Sermons, Lon., 1722, 5 vols. 8vo; new edit. revised and corrected, with a preface by Dr. Waterland, Lon., 1740, 4 vols. 8vo. These sermons possess great merit.

"Explained with good judgment, in a clear, easy, yet masculine style. A valuable treasure of sound divinity, of practical Christianity."—DR. WATERLAND.

"His Commentary on Matt. v.-viii. is the best extant. He ap-seems to have been a person of the utmost candour, and has solidly avoided all unkind and contemptuous reflections on his brethren. He has an excellent way of bringing down criticism to common capacities, and has discovered a vast knowledge of Scripture in the application of them."—Doddridge's Works, vol. v. 438.

"The best exposition of this discourse."—Bucknaster.

Blair, John, alias Arnold, a monk of the order of St. Benedict, was educated with Sir William Wallace at the school of Dundee, and became chaplain to him in 1294 when Wallace was made governor of the kingdom. He wrote the History of Wallace's Life in 1327, in Latin verse. A fragment of the MS. of this poem is still in the Cottonian Library. This was pub. in 1705, Edin., 8vo, by Sir Robert Sibbald,—Relationes quædam Arnoldi Blair, &c. See the Life and Acts of Sir William Wallace turned from Latin into Scotch Metre by one called Blind Harry, Edin., 1709, 12mo, Perth, 1790, 3 vols.; also Metrical History of Sir William Wallace and Robert Bruce, sine anno, black letter, 4to; The Actis and Deidis of the illustre and valkiesand Campioun, Schir William Wallace, Knight of Ellerslie, Edinburgh, be Robert Lekpreuik, at the Expensis of Henrie Charteris, 1570, 4to. A copy of this work will be found in the British Museum. The edit. of 1758 contains Arnaldi Blair Relationes. See Lowndes, art. Wallace, Sir William.

Blair, John, d. 1782, Prebendary of Westminster, a relative of Dr. Hugh Blair, was a native of Edinburgh. He removed at an early age to London, where he received some valuable preferments. The Chronology and History of the World from the Creation to A.D. 1753, Lon., 1754, fol. This work was partly arranged by Dr. Hugh Blair; 2d edit. 1756, fol.; other editions, 1768, '79, '90, 1803, '15, '20; and in 1844, imp. 8vo, an edition, with additions and corrections, was pub. by Sir Henry Ellis, K.H., Principal Librarian of the British Museum. Again in 1851, 8vo.

"The student of history, long accustomed to the doctor's ponderous and unmanageable folio, will rejoice over this handsome and handy volume. It is the revival and enlargement into far more compact and available form than the original, of the celebrated Chronological Tables of Dr. Blair. It comprises additions to our own time, and corrections from the most recent authorities. The outline of the plan is faithfully preserved and carried out, with every improvement of which it was susceptible."—London Examiner.

Blair, John, d. 1771, a native of Ireland, brother to Samuel Blair, also preached at Fog's Manor, Penn., and other places. He pub. a few sermons, &c.

Blair, Patrick, M.D., d. about 1728, a Scotch botanist, physician, and surgeon, first attracted attention abroad by an account of the dissection of an elephant which died in Dundee in 1706. The paper, Anatomy and Osteology of an Elephant, was pub. in Phil. Trans., Abr. v., p. 557, 1710; afterwards in (Lon.) 4to, 1713. Blair removed to London, and pub. there in 1720, 8vo, Botanical Essays, in two parts.

"In which he strengthened the arguments in proof of the sexes of plants, by sound reasoning and some new experiments."

He also pub. Pharmaco-Botanologia, Lon., 1723-28, 4to, extending only to the letter H; his death preventing its completion. A number of his professional treatises will be found in Phil. Trans., 1710-20. His Miscellaneous Observations on the Practice of Physick, Anatomy, and Surgery, with Remarks on Botany, was pub., Lon., 1718, 2 vols. 8vo.

"He was a Nonjuror, and for his attachment to the exiled family of Stuart was imprisoned, in the rebellion of 1715, as a suspected person."

Blair, Robert, 1593-1666, great-grandfather of Dr. Hugh Blair. Autobiography, from 1593-1636, pub. by Dr. McCrie, Edin., 1848, 8vo.

Blair, Robert, 1699-1747, a distant relative of Dr. Hugh Blair, was a native of Edinburgh. In 1731 he was ordained as a minister of the parish of Athelstaneford in East Lothian, where he remained until his death. He pub. in 1743, Lon., The Grave, a Poem; pub. at Edin. in 1747; numerous editions. With 12 Plates after Blake by Sachiaonetti, large 4to, pub., Lon., 1808, 1. p. £5 5s. (See BLAKE, WILLIAM.) This poem met with but little attention at first, but the commendation of Hervey, Pinkerton, and others, brought it into general notice. Of late years it seems to be but little read. Mr. Campbell praises it highly:

"The eighteenth century has produced few specimens of blank verse of so familiar and simple a character as that of The Grave.

It is a popular poem, not merely because it is religious, but because its language and imagery are free, natural, and picturesque.

Blair may be a homely and even a gloomy poet in the eye of fastidious criticism; but there is a masculine and pronounced character even in his gloom and homeliness that keeps it most distinctly apart from either dullness or vulgarity. His style pleases us like the powerful expression of a countenance without regular beauty."—Essay on English Poetry.

Mr. Campbell is quite indignant that some of this author's most nervous and expressive phrases should be censured as "vulgarisms;" but a poet who endeavours to insinuate droll satirical sketches, at the expense of physicians and undertakers, into a gallery of sublime representations of the sable hearse, the funeral cortege, and the gloomy aisles of the city of the dead, cannot hope to escape satire himself. Mr. Campbell's admiration of the simile of "angels' visits, short and far between," is well known. Whether Norris of Bemerton would have been pleased with the evident approval of his brother poets we do not venture to decide. That Blair was a poet of a high order, we hold to be unquestionable. The sketches commencing "See yonder hallowed fane!" and "Invidious Grave," show the hand of the master.

Blair, Samuel, d. 1751? a native of Ireland, settled in Pennsylvania, and about 1745 opened an academy at Fog's Manor, Chester County, and officiated at the church at this place. His works, consisting of Sermons, Treatises, and a Narrative of a Revival of Religion in Pennsylvania, were pub. in 1754 by Wm. Bradford, Philadelphia.

"Mr. Blair was one of the most learned and able, as well as pious, excellent, and venerable men of his day. He was a profound divine, and a most solemn and impressive preacher."—Allen's Amer. Biog. Dict.

Blair, Samuel, 1741-1818, a son of Samuel Blair, (see ante,) of Ireland, was born at Fog's Manor, Chester county, Pennsylvania. He married in 1769 a daughter of Dr. Shippen, the elder, of Philadelphia. He pub. in 1761 an Oration on the Death of George II.

Blair, William, 1765-1822, an eminent surgeon, was a native of Essex. He was not so much engrossed by professional pursuits as to prevent his taking a lively interest in the distribution of the Holy Scriptures, and in other benevolent enterprises. He pub. a number of professional and other works. Among them are The Soldier's Friend, or the Means of Preserving the Health of Military Men, Lon., 1798, 8vo. Of Anthropology, or the Natural History of Men, Lon., 1803, 8vo. The Vaccine Contest, or mild Humanity, Reason, Religion, and Truth, against fierce, unfeeling Ferocity, overbearing Insolence, mortified Pride, false Faith, and Desperation; being an exact outline of the arguments and interesting facts adduced by the principal Combatants on both sides respecting Cow-pox Inoculation, Lon., 1806, 8vo. This belligerent proclamation proves that our excellent doctor could buckle on his armour and be "a man of war" in defence of the right. He also pub. some pieces on Penitentiaries, &c., and contributed several papers to Phil. Trans., 1794, Med. Facts, 1795, and Memoirs Med., 1799.

Blake, John L., D.D. 1788-1857, b. at Northwood, N. H., grad. Brown University, 1812, in the class with Chief Justice Richard W. Greene, LL.D., Prof. Wm. G. Goddard, LL.D., and Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, D.D. He was Principal of a Young Ladies' School about 12 years, during which time he published a Text Book of Geography, Chronology, and History; Text Book of Modern Geography; Compendium of Universal Geography; First Reader; Second Reader; Historical Reader; High School Reader; Lectures on Rhetoric; First Book in Natural Philosophy; First Book in Astronomy; Mrs. Marce's Conversations, 4 vols. Some of these works have been in use more than forty years, and to them we are indebted for a new feature in School-Book Literature; namely, an analysis of the text in printed Questions at the bottom of each page, which plan has since been frequently adopted. He has been Rector of an Episcopal Church for fifteen years; the first at N. Providence, R. I., the next at Concord, N. H., and for nearly eight years at Boston. He has written numerous Theological orations and addresses, besides many sermons. During the twenty-five years prior to 1855, he has devoted his attention to general literature; the results of which are, his Family Encyclopedia, roy. 8vo, pp. 960; General Biographical Dictionary, roy. 8vo, pp. 1100.

"We cordially recommend this volume to all who desire a convenient and comprehensive summary of Biographical History, and hesitate not to say it is worthy of a place in every library."—Chronicle of the Church.

So great has been the demand for this work that the 8th edit. was pub. in 1853, and the 9th just before the author's death. Of several small volumes for school-libraries are the following: Book of Nature Laid Open; Parental Instructions; Wonders of the Earth; Wonders of the Ocean; Wonders of Art, &c.; Farmer's Every Day Book, 8vo, 654 pp.

"This work should not only be in the library of every farmer, but it should hold a prominent place in the library of every family in the country; for it presents ably and truly the importance of agriculture, and the advantages and pleasure of rural pursuits."—N. E. Farmer.

Bland, Elizabeth, of London, born about 1660, was celebrated for her knowledge of the Hebrew language, which was taught her by Lord Van Helmont. There is preserved in the Royal Society a phylactery in Hebrew, written by her at the request of Ralph Thoresby. Dr. Grew gives a description of this in his Account of Rarities preserved at Gresham College, Lon., 1681, fol. See Thoresby's Diary and Correspondence for several letters from Miss Bland (she was never married) to Ralph Thoresby. The honest antiquary thus details his surprise at the young lady's erudition:

"June 26, 1709. Walked to Beeston-Hall to visit Mr. Bland; was surprised to hear his daughter read Hebrew distinctly into English, which she learnt of her mother, who is an ingenious gentlewoman. She presented me with an autograph of the noted George Fox, the founder of Quakerism."

Blane, Sir Gilbert, Bart., M.D., 1749-1834, an eminent physician, was a native of Banefield, county of Ayr, Scotland. He served for some time in the Royal Navy, and was afterwards elected physician to St. Thomas's Hospital, and appointed Physician Extraordinary to George IV., and subsequently Physician in Ordinary to William IV. He was created a baronet in 1812. The prize medal awarded to the best journal kept by the surgeon of the Navy was a proposition of Sir Gilbert's. He pub. many professional works, 1775-1832. We notice some of the principal: Observations on the Diseases incident to Seamen, Lon., 1785, 8vo. A Lecture on Muscular Motion, Lon., 1790, 4to. This work is highly commended by physiologists. A Serious Address to the Public on the Practice of Vaccination, Lon., 1811, 8vo. Elements of Medical Logic, including a statement respecting the contagious nature of the Yellow Fever, Lon., 1818, 8vo. Select Dissertations on several Subjects of Medical Science, Lon., 1822, 8vo. Blessington, Countess of, 1787-1840, was b. at Knockbut, Tipperary, Ireland, the second daughter of Edmund Power, Esq., of Carrabeen. At the age of fifteen she married Captain Farmer of the 47th Regiment, R. A. He died in 1817. Possessed of great personal beauty, and highly accomplished, she did not long remain a widow, and in 1818 was married to Charles John Gardiner, Earl of Blessington. The Earl and Countess resided chiefly on the Continent until the death of the former in 1829, when she moved to London, and resided there, first in Berkeley-Square, and subsequently at Gore House, until 1840, when she removed to Paris, where she died in the same year. The marriage of her step-daughter, Lady Harriet Anne Frances Gardiner, the only child of the Earl of Blessington, to Count D'Oursay, their separation, and the subsequent family history, are no secrets either in the Empire of Fashion or the Republic of Letters.

Lord Byron was a great admirer of Lady Blessington, and her published Conversations with him was one of the most popular books of the day. Lady B.'s publications are numerous:

The Magic Lantern. Sketches and Fragments. Tour in the Netherlands. Conversations with Lord Byron. The Repealers. The Victims of Society.

"The Victims of Society, and The Repealers, have found particular favour in the eyes of those whose range of reading is still confined to the shelves of a circulating library."—Hunt's London Journal.

The Two Friends. Meredith.

"The plot is one which must be read through to be appreciated; and we take leave of Lady Blessington, knowing that the name of her readers will be legion, and that they will find ample amusement and interest in the clever and fanciful story of Meredith."—London Court Journal, July 8, 1845.

The Idler in Italy. The Idler in France.

"As Lady Blessington, during her residence in Paris, moved in the most brilliant society in the French metropolis, her Idler in France, as may readily be imagined, is remarkably rich in piquant anecdote. Exclusive of the large number of distinguished foreigners who have a place in these volumes, her ladyship introduces the reader to an assemblage, equally brilliant, of her own compatriots. Among others, the Dukes of Wellington and Hamilton; the Ladies Harriet de Rothschild, Lyndsay, and Dysart; Lords Byron, Yarmouth, Lilford, Lansdowne, Darnley, Charlemont, Stuart de Rothsay, Erskine, Glenelg, Rosalyn, John Russell, Allen, Pembroke, Palmerston, Castlereagh, Cadogan, and Abinger; Sirs Robert Peel, Francis Burdett, Andrew Baring, William Drummond, William Gell; Colonels E. Lygon, Leicester Stanhope, and Caradoc; and Messrs. Charles Mills, Douglas Kincaid, Standish, Cuthbert, Disraeli, Walter Savage Landor, Shelley, William Spencer, Rogers, Luttrell, &c."

"In Paris and Parisian society, Lady Blessington is quite at home."—London Athenæum.

"A couple of delightful volumes, by the most delightful of female writers."—London Weekly Chronicle.

The Governess. Confessions of an Elderly Gentleman.

"This is a most charming volume—full of the nice feeling, the keen perception, and the delicate mind of a woman. Certainly an elderly gentleman, who has been in love six times, has done his duty by the female sex; but the six lovely faces collected by Parris quite warrant the proceeding. Each face has its separate history delightfully done. The stories are singularly lively, and lighted up by a myriad of observations either shrewd or touching."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"This is much the best of Lady Blessington's fictions. It has the consistency of an autobiography; and the reader will listen with interest and curiosity till the Elderly Gentleman has nothing more to confess. There is incident enough in each of his tales to have furnished a three-volume novel. The two pathetic stories relieve the livelier ones very happily; and we close the records of his dreams and follies with a full conviction that the Elderly Gentleman deserved his six disappointments."—Lon. Athenæum.

"These Confessions are sparkling in their execution, and like all the novels of the accomplished writer, they are peculiarly Romans de Scille—the characters that move and breathe throughout them are the actual persons of the great world; and the reflections with which they abound belong to the philosophy of one who has well examined the existing manners. Her portraiture of familiar scenes, of every-day incidents, are matchless for truth and grace."—Edinburgh Review.

"There are few fictions, though of thrice the exterior pretensions of these Confessions, that possess so much weight."—London Monthly Review.

Country Quarters. Marmaduke Herbert. Confessions of an Elderly Lady.

"The Confessions of an Elderly Gentleman is a deservedly popular work; but its present companion is, we think, even superior. The niceties of feminine perception; the workings of the female heart; the innate feelings and educational restraints which control and modify the passions of the sex, shape its actions, and form its character, are all portrayed with striking fidelity. It is with these slight shades, which, like the strong colours in man's life, work out the destinies of woman, that Lady Blessington has painted the portrait of her heroine, and illustrated every turn of her fate, from over-indulged infancy to irritable and peevish age. The lesson is a fine one; the incidents full of interest, and the dénouement most skillful and admirable. Of axiomatic beauties, which always distinguish productions of real talent and merit, there are some sparkling gems, which cast a brilliant light upon the fabric, and afford a happy relief to the tissue of loves, and cares, and hopes, and disappointments, and sorrows. Parr's eight portraits are exquisite: we know not which is most lovely. They are, indeed, delightful illustrations of the story."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"It forms a pendant to Confessions of an Elderly Gentleman, by the same fair hand, and fully equals, if not exceeds, its predecessor. There are a grace and elegance about both works which cannot fail to attract and captivate."—John Bull.

"A more perfect moral assimilation of the female heart has seldom been exhibited in any work of fiction. The serious passages are agreeably relieved by some amusing sketches of the aristocracy of by-gone times. . . . If the confessions of the 'Lady' do not exhibit so much variety as those of the 'Gentleman,' they are infinitely superior in the depth of their interest, and in the excellence of the lessons they inculcate."—Morning Post.

"No actual confessions, whosever the autobiographer might be, ever interested us more; nor were any ever made that proffer a finer and truer lesson to humanity, to women especially. Vanity and pride in women were never laid bare by a firmer or gentler hand. . . . Immeasurably superior to the Confessions of an Elderly Gentleman."—Court Journal.

"The tale throughout is written with ease and elegance."—Athenæum.

Desultory Thoughts and Reflections. "These terse and well-digested aphorisms are as remarkable for their moral value as for their elegant and graceful setting."—Conservative Journal.

The Belle of a Season. Tour through the Netherlands to Paris. Strathren. Memoirs of a Femme de Chambre. The Lottery of Life, and other tales.

"Lady Blessington's book has been very pleasant reading to us. It is gracefully written throughout, and with a lively power of good-humoured ridicule. Lady Blessington excels in what we may call refined caricature, in which a spirit of frolic and exaggeration runs side by side with a cheerful fancy, shrewd observation, and humour both sharp and genial. These volumes will add to Lady Blessington's reputation, as a lively, acute, and agreeable writer."—London Examiner.

Lady B. contributed many articles to the periodicals of the day, and for 7 or 8 years edited The Keepsake and The Gems of Beauty.

We present the reader with a full-length portrait of the Countess of Blessington, drawn by the graphic pencil of an acquaintance of her ladyship—N. P. Willis, Esq., of New York.

"The portrait of Lady Blessington in the Book of Beauty is not unlike her, but it is still an unfavourable likeness. A picture by Sir Thomas Lawrence hung opposite me, taken, perhaps, at the age of eighteen, which is more like her, and as captivating a representation of a just matured woman, full of loveliness and love, the kind of creature with whose divine sweetness the gazer's heart aches, as ever was drawn in the painter's most inspired hour. The original is now (she confessed it very frankly) forty. She looks something on the sunny side of thirty. Her person is full, but preserves all the fineness of an admirable shape; her foot is not crowded in a satin slipper for which a Cinderella might be looked for in vain, and her complexion (an unusually fair skin, with very dark hair and eyebrows) is of even a girlish delicacy and freshness. Her dress of blue satin (if I am describing her like a milliner, it is because I have here and there a reader of the Mirror in my eye who will be amused by it) was cut low, and folded across her bosom, in a way to show to advantage the round and sculpture-like curve and whiteness of a pair of exquisite shoulders, while her hair dressed close to her head, and parted simply on her forehead with a rich fermeture of turquoise, enveloped in clear outline a head with which it would be difficult to find a fault. Her features are regular, and her mouth, the most expressive of them, has a ripe fulness and freedom of play, peculiar to the Irish physiognomy, and expressive of the most unsuspecting good humour. Add to all this a voice merry and sad by turns, but always musical, and manners of the most unpretending elegance, yet even more remarkable for their winning kindness, and you have the most prominent traits of one of the most lovely and fascinating women I have ever seen."—Pencilings by the Way.

We conclude with two opinions of rather a conflicting character:

"Many things have contributed to raise her to her present position of polite letters, beyond the general merits of her works. The charm of title, her indisputable taste in the fine arts, and, above all, her beauty, have been all along so many assisting excellencies to support her literary reputation. . . . When a lady condescends to write, whose equipage arrests the attention of the thousands that throng daily the fashionable localities of London, she is all the time, as her carriage rolls on from street to street, creating a new class of readers. Struck with the appearance of her equipage, they are anxious to ascertain how its owner looks, thinks, acts, and writes; the circulating libraries gain new subscribers, and Lady Blessington extends in this way the reputation of her genius."—Hunt's London Journal.

Audi alteram partem:

"As an acute and brilliant delineator of the traits and foibles of fashionable life, Lady Blessington is unequalled. She draws with a steady yet delicate hand the denizens of le beau monde, justly discriminating the various shades of character she has to deal with; and presents, at last, a lively picture, replete with striking contrast, yet exquisitely natural, of which we admire the execution, whilst we acknowledge the truth."—Court Journal.

Blomer, Ralph, D.D. Sermons, 1710, '12, '16, '30. Blomfield, Barrington. Sermon, 1728, 8vo.

Blomfield, Rt. Rev. Charles James, Bishop of London, 1786-1857, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge: he was third wrangler and senior medallist in 1808, and subsequently a Fellow of his College. He was successively Archdeacon of Colchester, in Kent, and Rector of St. Bartolph's, Bishopgate, London; was consecrated Bishop of Chester in 1824, and translated to London in 1828. His Lordship's reputation as a classical scholar, founded upon his editions of Æschylus and Callimachus, his contributions to the Museum Criticum, &c., is too well established to render it necessary to dwell upon the subject here. It is to be regretted that the Museum Criticum, which contains so many noble monuments of British Classical learning—the results of the erudite investigations of Maltby, Monk, Elmsley, Burney, Hare, the Blomfields, &c.—should have become so scarce that but few can profit by its precious pages. Bishop Blomfield favoured the world with several other publications. A Dissertation upon the Traditional knowledge of a Promised Redeemer, which subsisted before the Advent of our Saviour, Cambridge, 1819, 8vo. Five Lectures on the Gospel of St. John, as bearing Testimony to the Divinity of Jesus Christ, Lon., 1823, 12mo.

"A familiar elucidation of that particular branch of the demonstration which consists in the testimony of the beloved disciple."

Twelve Lectures on the Acts of the Apostles, Lon., 1829, 8vo.

"Very valuable lectures."—T. H. Horn.

"Strength of mind, perspicuity of diction, depth of reflection, and plety of sentiment, are discernible throughout."—Chris. Rememb.

To the above work is annexed a new edition of the Lectures on St. John, and in the appendix will be found Dr. Tucker's Brief and Dispassionate View of the Difficulties attending the Trinitarian, Arian, and Socinian Systems. A Letter on the Present Neglect of the Lord's Day, Addressed to the Inhabitants of London and Westminster, Lon., 1830, 8vo. Manual of Family Prayers, 18mo. Private Devotion, 18mo. Sermon at St. Botolph's, Bishopgate, 8vo. See Bishop Blomfield and his Times, a Historical Sketch by Rev. George Edward Biber, LL.D.

"The author had unusual advantages for noting many of the leading events as they occurred, and has made full use of his notebook."—Lon. Gent. Mag., Sept. 1857.

Blomfield, E. V., 1788-1816, brother of the above, Fellow and Tutor of Emanuel College, Cambridge. A trans. of Augustus Matthiæ's Greek Grammar, Cambridge University Press, 2 vols. 8vo; 6th edit. revised by Kenrick. "This edition of Matthiæ's Greek Grammar exhibits the most complete system of grammatical rules and examples that has yet been given to the world."

7th edit. abridged, revised by Edwards, 1 vol. 12mo.

"The editor has endeavoured to substitute shorter and more simple definitions and explanations than those which are contained in the original work."—Bishop of London: C. J. Blomfield's Preface.

E. V. B. contemplated a trans. of Schneider's and Pasow's lexicons, and he contributed some papers to the Museum Criticum.

Bloomfield, Nathaniel, brother of Robert Bloomfield. An Essay on War, in blank verse. Honington Green, a Ballad. The Culprit, an Elegy; and other Poems, 1803, 12mo.

Nathaniel had the honour of a lash from Lord Byron:

"If Phœbus smiled on you,
— BLOOMFIELD! why not on brother Nathan too?
Him too the Mæna, not the Muse, has seized;
Not inspiration, but a mind diseased:
And now no boor can seek his last abode,
No common be inclosed, without an ode."

"See Nathaniel Bloomfield's ode, elegy, or whatsoever he or any one else chooses to call it, on the Inclosure of Honington Green."—English Birds and Scotch Reviewers.

Bloomfield, Robert, 1766-1823, a native of Honington, in Suffolk, was the youngest son of a tailor, who died before Robert was a year old, leaving a widow with six children. Robert was placed in charge of his brother George in London, to learn the mystery of shoe-making. A knowledge of reading and writing was about all he acquired during the few months he was sent to school. By the kindness of his brother George and an acquaintance named Fawcett, he was furnished with a number of books, —a History of England, British Traveller, a Geography, Paradise Lost, the Seasons, &c. This last work so enchanted him that for some time he spent all his leisure hours in its perusal. Whilst working with six or seven other men in a garret, he composed mentally, arranged and rearranged, his poem of the Farmer's Boy, without committing a line to paper. When able to procure paper he had, as he remarks, "nothing to do but to write it down." The poem was offered to several publishers without success; but Bloomfield found a warm friend in Capel Loft, who took measures to have it printed. Its success was so great that 26,000 copies were sold in three years. In the next year an edition was pub. at Leipzig; a trans. into the French, Le Valet du Fermier, appeared in Paris; a trans. into Italian was pub. in Milan, and the Rev. W. Clubbe produced Agricola Puer, in Latin verse. The other publications of Bloomfield were, Rural Tales, Ballads, and Songs, Lon., 1802, 8vo; Good Tidings, or News from the Farm, 1804, 4to; Wild Flowers, 1806, 18mo; Banks of the Wye, 1811; Works, 2 vols., 1814, 18mo; May Day with the Muses, 1822, 12mo. His Remains in Poetry and Verse, 2 vols. 8vo, appeared in 1824. Our author, in consequence of imprudent liberality to poor relations, and of an unfortunate adventure in the book business, lived in poverty, and died some £200 in debt, leaving a widow and four children.

Few compositions in the English language have been so generally admired as The Farmer's Boy. Those who agreed in but little else in literary matters were unanimous in the commendation of the poetical powers displayed by the peasant and journeyman mechanic. When Lord Byron, in revenge for a deserved fagellation at the hands of Jeffrey, undertook, with that mixture of arrogance and petty malice which were his distinguishing characteristics, to turn the literary corps into the subjects of a general whipping-school, he does not forget the author of the Farmer's Boy:

"Hear then, ye happy sons of needless trade!
Swains quit the plough, resign the useless spade:
Lo! Burns and Bloomfield, nay, a greater far,
Gifford, was born beneath an adverse star,
Forsook the labours of a servile state,
Stem'd the rude storm, and triumph'd over Fate."—English Birds and Scotch Reviewers. See BLOOMFIELD, NATHANIEL.

Among the eulogists of Bloomfield have been Parr, Southey, Aiken, Watson, Montgomery, Dr. Drake, and Sir Egerton Brydges. We quote some opinions:

"Such indeed are the merits of this work, [The Farmer's Boy], that, in true pastoral imagery and simplicity, I do not think any production can be put in competition with it since the days of Theocritus. To that charming rusticity which particularizes the Grecian, are added the individuality, fidelity, and boldness of description which render Thomson so interesting to the lovers of Nature."—DR. NATHAN DRAKE: Literary Hours.

"Flowing numbers, feeling plety, imagery and animation, a taste for the picturesque, force of thought, and a true sense of the natural and pathetic."

Mr. Loft considers to be the common characteristics of Thomson's Seasons and Bloomfield's Farmer's Boy. He does not perceive any other resemblance, as some profess to do.

"Mr. Bloomfield, on the publication of The Farmer's Boy, was looked on as a poetical prodigy, and not without reason. For he shewed in that poem a very fine feeling for the beauties and the occupations of the country. . . . It is most agreeable to read his unlaboured descriptions of ploughing, and sowing, and reaping, and sheaf-binding, and compeuncious shooting of rooks. . . . The Farmer's Boy is by far the best written, as to style and composition, of any work of our uneducated poets. The melody of the versification is often exceedingly beautiful. . . . The Rural Tales were many of them very good. . . . The description of the Blind Boy [in the News from the Farm] is worthy of being inserted among the Flowers of English Poetry; graceful, elegant, and most deeply affecting, even to tears."—Blackwood's Mag., 1822.

"The poem certainly discovers very clearly the powers of natural, unaffected genius."—Lon. Monthly Review.

"We are here called away from our abstruser studies by these productions of a genuine child of nature. In Bloomfield's first poem, The Farmer's Boy, we saw and commended the evidence of an original genius, well deserving of encouragement and cultivation. With The Farmer's Boy we were highly pleased, because it showed, in the most striking manner, the natural movements of an ingenuous mind; but we hesitate not to declare ourselves still more satisfied with the present volume." [Rural Tales, Ballads, and Songs].—British Critic.

The Anti-Jacobin and Critical Review also highly commend the Rural Tales, &c.:

"We now hail, with increased satisfaction, the more matured flights of his well-betested imagination."—Anti-Jacobin.

"We hope and believe that the success of this volume will equal that of The Farmer's Boy: as we are sure that its merits are not inferior."—Critical Review.

As we commenced the quotation of opinions by a poetical sneer of Lord Byron's, we shall conclude with some stanzas which are much more creditable to their author:

"It is not quaint and local terms
Besprinkled o'er thy rustic lay,
Though well such dialect confirms
Its power unletter'd minds to sway;
But 'tis not these that most display
Thy sweetest charms, thy gentlest thrall;—
Words, phrases, fashions pass away,
But Truth and Nature live through all."

Tribute to the Memory of Robert Bloomfield, by Bernard Barton.

Bloomfield, S. T., of Sidney College, Cambridge, D.D., Vicar of Bisbrook. This distinguished scholar has favoured the public with several very valuable works. Recensio synoptica annotationis sacre; being a critical digest and synoptical arrangement of the most important annotations on the New Testament, exegetical, philological, and doctrinal, from the best commentators, 8 vols. 8vo, Lon., 1826.

"The leading feature of this work is the incorporation of the whole of the exegetical and philological Annotations of Wetstein, with a great quantity of biblical erudition, extracted from other valuable sources. It would be impossible to convey to our readers an adequate idea of the mass of information which the learned author has brought to bear upon the numerous passages which he has undertaken to illustrate; and we can safely say, that in the portion of the New Testament which this part of the work embraces—the Four Gospels—the inquirer will find very few, of which Mr. Bloomfield has not given a complete and satisfactory exposition."—Quarterly Theological Rev., Sept. 1826.

"There is scarcely a single passage which is not elucidated. Altogether this is one of the most important works in sacred literature which has ever been offered to the attention of the Bible student."—Horae.

Epitome Evangelica, 18mo. The following work is indeed invaluable. Greek-and-English Lexicon of the New Testament, by E. Robinson, D.D., Professor of Biblical Literature in the Theological Seminary, New York; edited, with careful revision, corrections, and occasional additions, and a Preface by S. T. B., 1 vol. 8vo.

"We consider it the best lexicon of the Greek Testament that is extant. Dr. Bloomfield has proved himself an indefatigable scholar, and his edition deserves unbounded success."—Church of Eng. Quarterly Review.

"It must prove of great value and advantage to every Clerical student who is wise enough to procure it."—Brit. Critic and Quarterly Theological Review.

Greek and Eng. Lexicon to the N. Test.; 2d edit. greatly enlarged and considerably improved.

"In preparing this new edition for the press, besides availing himself of every critical aid to which he could obtain access, Dr. Bloomfield has completely re-cast—we might perhaps say, almost re-written—the work. At least one-sixth of new matter has been added. The etymological department of the work has been much improved. In the more important words of the New Testament, instead of bare references, which he had before given, the words themselves are now added, inasmuch that the work in its present state may, in most cases, serve as a concordance to the Greek Testament. Great additional pains have been bestowed in collecting from the Septuagint, and from the learned Jewish-Greek writers, Philo and Josephus, whatever is most adapted to illustrate the peculiar idioms of the New Testament. We regard this as a capital improvement. The typographical arrangement of the pages is also greatly improved. Altogether, this is confessedly the most useful, as it is the cheapest, Lexicon to the Greek Testament extant in our language."—Church of England Quarterly Review.

Lexilogus Scholasticus, 18mo. Trans. of Thucydides, 3 vols. 8vo, 1829.

"By far the best translation of Thucydides. The Notes are a treasury of Erudition."—Classical Journal.

"In the Notes by this Translator, numerous interesting points of Classical Antiquities are ably discussed, and many thousands of invaluable illustrations of the obscure passages of the Author are adduced from the best Greek writers of every age. As to the Version, considering the all but insuperable difficulties with which the Translator has had to contend, in a writer said by some great scholars to be untranslatable, we can with truth say that he has executed his task with fidelity, taste, and judgment. Upon the whole, we can pronounce the work to be quite indispensable to all who would hope to understand the text of the greatest of the Historians, but most obscure of writers."—Lon. Gentleman's Magazine.

"A version as liberal and as perspicuous as erudition and industry combined can render it."—Edinb. Review.

The Greek Testament, with English Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory, &c., 2 vols. 8vo, Lon., 1832; 2d ed., 1836; 3d, 1839; 4th, 1841. The 2d ed. was enlarged from the 1st, and the 3d upon the 2d; the 4th is almost exactly the same as the 3d; 9th ed., 1856, 2 vols. 8vo.

"Upon the whole, without depreciating the merit of the labours of preceding editors, this third edition of the Greek Testament, by Dr. Bloomfield, may justly be regarded as the most valuable for biblical students that has yet been issued from the press in this country."—Horne's Introduc.; which see for copious notices of Dr. B.'s labours.

"Invaluable to all those whose profession requires, or whose leisure admits of, a critical study of the sacred writings. Dr. B. has deserved well both of the Church and of the Christian world, and has fairly earned the highest remuneration which the dispensers of ecclesiastical patronage have to bestow."—Edinb. Review.

College and School Greek Testament, with English Notes, 12mo.

"This edition of the Greek Testament supplies a desideratum in scholastic literature. The notes (which are strictly grammatical, scholastic, and elementary) furnish to the juvenile student every requisite aid for the correct interpretation of the New Testament. The volume is as cheap as it is beautifully and accurately printed."—Christian Remembrancer.

"It certainly, as a manual, has great advantage over the Testaments of Hardy and Valpy."—Church of Eng. Quarterly Review.

"Dr. Bloomfield's New Testament for the use of Schools, Lecturer's, Colleges, &c., is an invaluable work; the notes and critical apparatus being in general constructed with great labour for the present edition.

"It is impossible to say how far the public are indebted to Dr. Bloomfield for these labours of his industrious pen; they will carry down his name with the highest honour to posterity."—Evangelical Mag., Nov. 1.

"This interesting production is among the number now publishing, which do credit to the taste and judgment of the country by their object, and to the Arts by their style and execution."—Lon. Literary Gazette.

"A beautiful, and, indeed, captivating performance. The engravings, in the line manner, are from the faithful pencil, and in part from the burin, of Mr. Blore; and more brilliant, or rather characteristic, performances have never yet been witnessed. The proof impressions, on India paper, have a fascinating effect; but the critical antiquary will be equally well pleased with the ordinary copies."—Diction's Library Companion.

Great is Diana of the Ephesians, Lon., 1680, 8vo. Also of a deistical tendency. Janus Scientiarum, Lon., 1684, 8vo. William and Mary Conquerors, 1693, 4to. A curious pamphlet, well meant, but not relished by Parliament, who ordered it to be burnt. Mr. Blount was married at 18; on the death of his wife he offered marriage to her sister, which was declined from conscientious scruples. Having no religious principle to enable him to bear disappointment, this foolish man shot himself through the head in 1693. After his death Mr. Gildon, also a disciple of infidelity, pub. many of Blount's letters in a work called The Oracles of Reason. (Oracles of Folly would have been the proper title.) These precious relics of credulity—for nothing is so credulous as infidelity—were afterwards pub., together with some of the author's pieces, in 1690, 8vo, under the title of The Miscellaneous Works of Charles Blount, Esq. Gildon justified his friend in blowing out his brains, and promised that he would blow his own out at some future convenient time; but whether a "return of non est inventus" rendered this impossible, or some other good reason prevented, we are not told. Certain it is that he condescended to live till his time ran out. Dr. Nichols took Blount to task in his Conference with a Theist; see also Leland's Deistical Writers; Mosheim's History; and Bishop Van Mildert's Boyle's Lectures.

Blount, Sir Henry, 1602–1682, father of Charles and Sir Thomas Pope Blount, was of the ancient family of the Blounts of Sodington, in Worcestershire. In 1616 he was entered a gentleman commoner in Trinity College, Oxford, founded by his ancestor, Sir Thomas Pope. After travelling for nearly two years, he pub. in 1636, Lon., 4to, A Voyage into the Levant, being a brief relation of a Journey lately performed from England by the Way of Venice, into Dalmatia, Sclavonia, Bosnia, Hungary, Macedonia, Thessaly, Thrace, Rhodes, and Egypt, and to Grand Cairo; with particular observations concerning the modern condition of the Turks, and other people under that Empire. This work was so popular that several editions were speedily disposed of, and it was trans. into French and Dutch; 2d edit., Lon., 1637, 4to; 3d edit., 1638, 4to; again pub. in 1650 and 1669, 12mo; 8th edit. also 12mo. See Osborne's Voyages, vol. i. p. 511, 1745; also Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, 1808–13.

"Blount's Travels to the Levant is a very short account of a Journey through Dalmatia, &c.; the whole very concise, and without any curious observations, or any notable descriptions. His account of the religions and customs of those people is only a brief collection of some other travellers; the language mean, and not all of it to be relied on, if we credit others who have writ better."—Introduct. to Churchill's Collec. of Voyages and Travels.

"The Voyage into the Levant is the voyage of a Skeptic; it has more of the philosopher than the traveller, and would, probably, never have been written but for the purpose of insinuating his religious sentiments. Yet his reflections are so striking and original, and so artfully interwoven with the thread of his adventures, that they enliven instead of embarrassing the narrative. He has the plausible art of colouring his paradox with the resemblance of truth. So little penetration had the orthodox court of Charles the First, that merely on the merit of this book, he was appointed one of the band of gentleman pensioners."—Warren's Life of Sir Thomas Pope.

Sir Henry wrote an Epistle in Praise of Tobacco and Coffee, prefixed to a little treatise entitled Organon Salutis, written by W. Rumsey, Esq., 1657, 59, 64, 12mo. A Satire entitled The Exchange Walk, pub. in 1647, was written by Blount.

"As I have been informed by some of his relations, tho' his sons know nothing of it."—Wood.

However this may be, Wood certainly errs (according to Dr. Bliss) in stating that Sir Henry pub. John Lillie's Six Comedies, Lon., 1632, 8vo.

"They were published by Edward Blount, the bookseller, one of the proprietors of the first edition of the plays of Shakspeare."

Though Dr. Bliss made this correction in 1813, the error has been handed down in our latest works. But such imperfection must be, and doubtless we have our full share. In the Oracles of Reason, (see BLOUNT, CHARLES,) will be found a Latin fragment by Sir Henry, which shows that the skeptical opinions of Charles Blount were certainly not likely to be rectified by the unsound sentiments of his father. Of solid judgment there would seem to have been a sad deficiency in both.

Blount, J., Surgeon. Con. to Memoirs Med., 1792.

Blount, John, in Latin, Blondus, a divine of the 13th century, was educated at the Universities of Oxford and Paris. He has the credit of being the first that lectured on Aristotle, both in Paris and Oxford.—Wood's Annals. He was Prebendary and Chancellor in the Church of York, and in 1232 was elected Archbishop of Canterbury, by the chapter. The pope, however, declared the election void; the secret objection Bale considers to have been that Blount

"Was more learned than that court wished an archbishop to be."

As an author Blount was very famous. It is doubtful if any of his works are extant. Bale mentions Summarium Sacre Facultatus, lib. i., Disceptationes aliquot, lib. i., and several Commentaries on the Scriptures.—Leland; Bale; Pitt; Wood's Annals, by Gutch, &c.

"He was celebrated by his contemporaries for the elegance of his style, and for the extensiveness of his learning. John Ross speaks of him as a prodigy of erudition."

Blount, Thomas, 1618–1679, a native of Bardeley in Worcestershire, entered himself of the Middle Temple, and was admitted to the Bar.

"Of a noble and ancient family of his name, but never advantaged in learning by the help of an university, [he was a R. Catholic], only his own industry, together with the helps of his scholastical acquaintances."—Wood.

His publications were numerous. The Art of making Devises, trans. from Henry Estienne, Lon., 1646, 4to; again enlarged, 1650, 4to. Academie of Eloquence, 1654, 12mo.

Glossographia, Lon., 1656, '70, '71, '79, '91, 8vo; enlarged by W. Nelson, 1717, fol. This is a dictionary of obscure legal terms. He presented Anthony Wood with a copy of it:

"Reciev'd from Tho. Blount, of the Inner Temple, Esq., a book of his writing, &c. . . . This book he gave A. W. because he had, in his great reading, collected some old words for his use, which were remitted therein. Afterwards sending to him more, they were remitted into the second edition of that book."—Athen. Oxon; Life.

This 2d edit. was pub. 1670. The Lamps of the Law, and the Lights of the Gospel, Lon., 1658, 8vo. A Pedigree of the Blounts, printed in Peachman's Complete Gentleman, 1661. Boscobel, or the Compleat History of his Sacred Majesties most Miraculous Preservation after the Battle of Worcester, 3d Sep., 1651, in two parts; 1st part, Lon., 1660, 12mo. Collection of the Statutes concerning Bankrupts, with the Resolutions of the Judges upon the same, Lon., 1670, 8vo. In 1673 he pub. a criticism upon Phillips's New World of Words, and in 1672 Animadversions upon Baker's Chronicle. A Cat. of the Catholics who lost their lives in the King's Cause, during the Civil War. Fragmenta Antiquitatis, &c., Lon., 1679, 1784, 8vo; new ed. by Beckwith, 1815, 4to. A work of great popularity. Boscobel, the Second Part, with the addition of the Claustrum Regale reseratum, or the King's concealment at Trent, in Somersetshire, pub. by Mrs. Anne Windham of Trent, Lon., 1681. This work was formerly much sought after by the curious. See a valuable notice of Boscobel in the Retrospective Review, vol. xiv. 47-68.

"The two tracts entitled Boscobel, with all the plates, are among the most scarce and high-priced historical pamphlets of the 17th century."—Retros. Review.

Blount also pub. A Catholic Almanac, 1661, '62, '63, and an Animadversion on Booker's Almanac.

"He was a man of general knowledge, and an industrious and useful writer."

Blount, Sir Thomas Pope, 1649-1697, eldest son of Sir Henry, and brother of Charles Blount, sat in Parliament as member for St. Alban's and Hertfordshire; he was also for the last thirty years of his life commissioner of accounts, to which post he was elected by the House of Commons. He pub. in 1690, Lon., folio,

"CENSURA CELEBRIORUM AUCTORUM sive tractatus in quo varia virorum doctorum de clarissimis, cujusque, seculi scriptoribus judicia traduntur. Unde facillimo negotio lector dignoscere queat, quid in singulis quibusque istorum auctorum maximè memorabile sit, & quoniam in pretio apud eruditos semper habiti fuerint. Omnia in studiose gratiam colligit & in ordinem digerit secundum seriem temporis quo ipsi auctores floruerunt: i. e. A CRITIQUE ON THE MOST CELEBRATED WRITERS, or a treatise in which the various opinions of the most learned men, as to the merit of the most famous authors in every age, are delivered, whereby the reader may, with great ease, discern what is most memorable with respect to each of these authors, and in what esteem they have always been among the learned. The whole for the use of the studious, collected and digested according to the order of time in which the authors flourished."—Biog. Brit.; in which see the author's admirable epistle explaining his design.

It will be observed that the plan of this work is the one in view in the present volume, (limited to British and American authors,) though one entertained by us long before we were acquainted with the peculiarities of Sir Thomas's excellent compilation. It is written in Latin, and in the foreign editions, Geneva, 1694, 4to, and 1710, 4to, the quotations from modern languages are trans. into Latin, so as to give the whole a uniform appearance.

"When I first began the work, it was scarcely in my thoughts to communicate it to the learned world: for my own use I drew it together; and now at the request of persons of distinguished learning, give it to the Public. The rather because having observed with what eagerness the Acta Eruditorum, and other books of the same nature, are caught up, not only by men of slender learning, but even such as are in the first forms of learning. I could not but hope, that even this collection of mine, such as it is, would not displease them."—Epistle to the reader, in Biog. Brit.

Sir Thomas's list of authors is brief indeed, as it includes less than 600 names, although he begins with "Hermes Trismegistus, who is thought to have been coeval with Moses, and from him I descend to our own time."

We intend that our list shall enrol the names of some 30,000 authors, but cannot, of course, be expected to be very diffuse in treating of each one. Nicéron compares the Censura to Baillet's Jugemens des Savans, but there is the important difference that Baillet reports the opinions of others in his own words with his additions, whilst Blount transcribes them literally, which, remarks a critic, "adds considerably to their value." This value, at least, the present volume will possess, whilst we shall take the liberty which Monsieur Baillet indulges in, of occasionally stating our own views.

"Blount omits no class nor any age; his arrangement is nearly chronological, and leads the reader from the earliest records of literature to his own time. The polite writers of modern Europe, and the men of science, do not receive their full share of attention; but this volume, though not, I think, much in request at present, is a very convenient accession to any scholar's library."—Bailem's Lib. of Europe.

"That most useful book, published by Sir Thomas Pope Blount, entitled Censura, &c."—Dr. Haewood.

"Sir Thomas Pope Blount's Censura, &c. is unquestionably a learned work—the production of a rural and retired life."

"Umbraticum enim vitam et ab omni strepitu remotam semper in delictis habui, says the author in the preface. It treats chiefly of the most learned men, and sparingly of the English."—Dibdin's Bibliomania.

"The object of the Censura, &c. was to bring together the opinions of the learned on the most distinguished writers of all countries from the earliest periods; and the very accomplished and erudite compiler has accordingly produced a volume of great research, authority, and use."—Six Esqrs. Barbers: Censura Litteraria, vol. i.

"It is hard to say whether the author's pains or his modesty be more conspicuous. This we may be the rather allowed to say, having often consulted Sir Thomas's book in order to enrich our own."—Biog. Brit.

Sir Thomas pub. in 1693, 12mo, A Natural History, containing many not common observations, extracted out of the best modern authors.

"He presents the public with the fruits of his reading, as to Natural History, without depriving those from whom he drew his knowledge, of any part of their reputation; a conduct which few have imitated, and which we can scarcely enough commend."—Biog. Brit.

"His Essays in point of learning, judgment, and freedom of thought, are certainly no way inferior to those of the famous Montaigne."—Ibid.

De Re Poëtica, or Remarks upon Poetry; with Characters and Censures of the most considerable Poets, whether ancient or modern. Extracted out of the best and choicest critiques, Lon., 1694, 4to.

"It is a pity that he had not left out the whole of what relates to the Greek and Latin, and confined himself entirely to the British Poets."—Dibdin's Bibliomania.

The works of this excellent author are now rarely to be found, and a republication, by one of the enterprising publishers of the day, the Bohus, Knights, Murrays, Longmans, et id genus omne, (we do not use the phrase in the Horatian sense,) would be of great advantage to the Republic of Letters.

Blount, Walter Kirckham. The Spirit of Christianity, Lon., 1686, 8vo.

Blow, John, 1648-1708, an eminent musician, a native of Nottinghamshire. Boyce and Aldrich printed some of his church music, but many pieces are still in MS. When will they be collected and published? Why does not Mr. Hullah give them to the world? Blow's secular compositions were pub. in 1700, folio, under the title of Amphion Anglicus, in imitation of Purcell's collection, the Orpheus Britannicus; but are thought much inferior. Some of his choral productions are in a very bold and grand style, yet he is unequal and frequently unhappy in his attempts at new harmony and composition. Dr. Burney criticises his works, and Sir John Hawkins gives us some information concerning his peculiarities.

Blunt, Edmund, son of Edmund M., b. Nov. 13, 1799, Newburyport, Mass., an hydrographer of great skill and utility. From 1816 to the present date (1858) he has been engaged in making charts and prosecuting surveys in Guatemala, West Indies, and the sea-coasts of the U. States.

Blunt, Edmund M., b. June 20, 1770, Portsmouth, N.H., resident of N.Y., and father of Joseph, Edmund, George W., and Nathaniel B. Blunt. Amer. Coast Pilot, and many other nautical works of great merit. The Coast Pilot was first pub. in 1796, at Newburyport, Mass.; 18th ed., large 8vo, N.Y., 1858. This work sustains a high reputation for accuracy, and is in general use by the American merchant-marine. It has been translated into most of the languages of Europe.

Blunt, George W., son of Edmund M., b. March 11, 1802, in Newburyport, Mass., one of the editors of the Coast Pilot since 1826; also editor of other nautical works.

Blunt, Henry, d. 1843, Rector of Streatham, Surrey, and Chaplain to the Duke of Richmond. For some years Mr. B. was incumbent of Trinity Church in Sloane street, called Upper Chelsea. In 1835 the Duke of Bedford presented him to the Rectory of Streatham. Mr. Blunt's publications are highly popular. Two Sermons on the Sacrament, 1825. Sermon on the Funeral of Gen. Sir Henry Calvert, 1826. 8 Lectures upon the History of Jacob, 1828. 9 Lectures upon the History of St. Peter, 1829. National Mercies a Motive for National Reformation, 1830. 12 Lectures upon the History of Abraham, 1831. A Sermon upon the Lord's Day, 1832. 12 Lectures upon the History of St. Paul, Part 1, 1832. Posthumous Sermons and Pastoral Letters, 2d edit., 3 vols., 1844, '45, '47, 12mo. Some of Mr. B.'s works have gone through 40 editions in England, and have been extensively circulated in the United States.

"The most popular religious books of the age in style and matter." "It has been suggested that Mr. Blunt's Commentary on the Old Testament should be read as a companion to that of Bishop Sumner on the New."

"Devoid of all pretension in his style of composition, and of all studied elaboration in his train of thought, our author is one of the clearest and most effective writers of his day. Simplicity and perspicuity are the main charms of his publications, and of his pulpit discourses; and combined as those qualities are with sprightliness of thought, with occasional sallies of imagination, and with a rich vein of appropriate illustration, they constitute him at once an instructive preacher and an acceptable writer. . . . Would that all ministers, in and out of the Church of England, were such in real talent, and devotedness."—Lon. Evang. Mag.

Boardman, Henry A., D.D., was b. 1808, at Troy, in New York, graduated at Yale College in 1829. He has been since 1833 pastor of the Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. In 1853 the General Assembly elected him to fill the Chair of Pastoral Theology and Church Government, Composition and Delivery of Sermons, in the Theological Seminary at Princeton, New Jersey, but he declined the honour, preferring to remain with a congregation and community to which he is greatly endeared by his many excellent qualities as a Christian and a gentleman. Dr. Boardman's publications have been numerous. We notice some of the principal: The Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin, pp. 120, 1839. Letters to Bishop Doane on the Oxford Tracts, pp. 100, 1841. The Prelatical Doctrine of the Apostolical Succession examined, pp. 350, 12mo, 1844. The Importance of Religion to the Legal Profession, 1849. The Bible in the Family, pp. 300, 12mo, 1851. The Bible in the Counting-House: a Course of Lectures to Merchants, pp. 400, 12mo, 1853.

"Dr. Boardman's style reflects his own mental vigour, clearness, vivacity, industry, finish, and taste. It abounds in apt illustrations, puts abstract principles in concrete living forms, is relieved by salient points and sparkling jests; it often rings with the notes of a genuine eloquence, and is enriched with copious and apposite facts, apparently noted for the purpose in the course of an extensive reading."—Princeton Review.

"The style of these lectures is altogether admirable and perfectly adapted to their subject; it is free and familiar, without condescending to commonplace or flippancy, and is often impressive and eloquent without being suggestive of the pulpit."—Putnam's Monthly Mag.

"Eminently judicious and practical, and forms a worthy supplement to the great work of Dr. Chalmers on the same subject."

"This work is intended for those learners of languages who, being suddenly called abroad, require a ready precision of current words. Mr. Boardman rashly combines in one vocabulary both northern and southern words. His German column should have been omitted; it is incorrectly printed and ludicrously careless. The performance displays a very inconsiderable knowledge of comparative grammar."—Lon. Monthly Review, 1812.

"An admirable work. Dr. Boase has anticipated a movement recently communicated to geological science in this country, which would certainly have told by its effect in a very short time. His book involves some of the most refined discussions of which Geology is susceptible, and we cannot but express our ardent admiration for the talent and research which it displays."—*Lon. Boate, Gerard, was a native of Holland, but we naturalise him for his services as Physician to the State in Ireland, and his excellent work entitled Ireland's Natural History, pub. by Samuel Hartlib, Lon., 1662, 12mo. Bodley, James, M.D. A Critical Essay upon the Works of Physicians, Lon., 1741, 8vo.

Bodley, Josias, youngest brother of Sir Thomas Bodley, wrote Observations concerning the fortresses of Ireland and the British Colonies of Ulster, and Jocular Description of a Journey taken by him to Leale in Ulster, in 1602. These pieces have not been printed.

Bodley, Laurence, b. about 1546, d. 1615, a younger brother of Sir Thomas Bodley, and a benefactor to the Bodleian Library, was a graduate of Christ Church College, Oxford. He wrote an elegy on the death of Bishop Jewel, which was pub. in Humphrey's Life of that prelate.

Bodley, Sir Thomas, 1544-1612, the illustrious founder of the noble Library at Oxford which bears his name, was a native of Duncomb, near Crediton. His birthday, March 2d, should ever be honoured, not only by the sons of Oxford, but also by the disciples of letters and philosophy in all parts of the world. His father being warmly attached to the Protestant cause, and, therefore, obnoxious to the favourites of Queen Mary, resided for some years at Geneva, where Thomas attended the lectures of Chevalier on Hebrew, Beroald on Greek, and Calvin and Besa on Divinity. Returning to England, he was entered at Magdalen College in 1559. Here in due season he became lecturer on the Greek tongue, reader on Natural Philosophy, and junior proctor. Leaving college, he travelled for nearly four years, and three years after his return was appointed Esquire of the Body to Queen Elizabeth. He now devoted himself to diplomacy, and resided abroad for almost the whole period from 1585 to 1597. Having retired to private life, he determined to put in execution a long-cherished plan, to found in Oxford a library worthy of the reputation of that ancient seat of learning. Accordingly he made a proposition to this effect in a letter "from London, Feb. 23, 1597," to Dr. Ravis, Vice-Chancellor of Oxon. He prefaces his noble overture with the declaration that "I have been always of a mind that, if God, of his goodness, should make me able to do any thing for the benefit of posterity, I would shew some token of affection that I have evermore borne to the studies of good learning."

This liberal proposition was received in a better spirit than has been evinced in some cases of a like nature in our own day by certain institutions of learning in England and America. Bodley encouraged others to follow his example, and the harvest was so plentiful that Sir Thomas determined to pull down the old fabric and "build greater." On the 19th of July, 1610, he laid the first stone of a new edifice, which he did not live to see completed. In 1629 the third Earl of Pembroke made a valuable addition to the Library, of several hundreds of valuable Greek MSS. In 1623 Sir Kenelm Digby added to its stores, and after this followed the precious collections of Laud, Selden, Francis Junius, and many others. We presume that the Bodleian Library numbers this day (1854) not less than 250,000 volumes. Sir Thomas wrote his Life in 1609, which was pub. Oxon., 1847, 4to, and again by Hearne in the Reliquie Bodleianæ, 1763, 8vo, including his Letters to Dr. James, &c. Litteræ D. Tho. Bodleio, &c., Ox., 1658, 4to.

"Out of 234 Letters, not above 2 are dated; which renders the little historical matter in them of less value: they wholly turn on buying and sorting books, building the library, and other matters relating to that subject."—COLL.

Dr. Thomas James prepared a catalogue of the Library pub. 1605, '20, '35, '36. It then contained some 20,000 articles. The reader will be pleased to see by reference to the following testimonies, the veneration with which the character of Sir Thomas was regarded by his contemporaries:

Oratio Funeris habita in Schola Theologica in Obitum clariss. Equitis Tho. Bodley, Oxon, 1613, 4to. This oration (by J. Wake) is reprinted in Dr. Will. Bates's Vitæ selectorum aliquot virorum. Justa Funeraria Ptolemæi Oxoniensis, Thomæ Bodlei Equitis avrati, celebrata in Academiâ Oxoniensi. Mensis Martii 29, 1613; Oxon., 1613, 4to. This collection of funeral verses contains contributions by Archbishop Laud, Robert Burton, author of the Anatomy of Melancholy, Isaac Casaubon, &c.

"Thomas Bodley, another Ptolemy, though no writer worth the remembrance, yet hath been the greatest promoter of learning that hath yet appeared in our nation."—ARTHUR WOOD.

"View this illustrious bibliomaniac, with his gentleman-like air, and expressive countenance, superintending, with the seal of a Custom-house officer, the shipping, or rather burying, of his books for the grand library which is now called by his OWN NAME! Think upon his activity in writing to almost every distinguished character of the realm: soliciting, urging, entreating for their support towards his magnificent establishment; and, moreover, superintending the erection of the building, as well as examining the timbers with the nicety of a master-carpenter! Think of this; and when you walk under the grave and appropriately-ornamented roof, which tells you that you are within the precincts of the BODLEIAN LIBRARY, pay obeisance to the portrait of the founder, and hold converse with his gentle spirit that dwells therein."—Doddie's Bibliomaniac.

It is an interesting fact that two of the first scholars of their respective periods, Isaac Casaubon and Philip Blaeu, the one in 1613 and the other about 1813, acknowledge their obligations to the noble founder of the Bodleian Library:

"As long as I remained at Oxford, I passed whole days in the Library; for books cannot be taken out, but the library is open to all scholars for seven or eight hours every day. You might always see therefore many of these, greedily enjoying the banquet prepared for them, which gave me no small pleasure."—Cassab. Epist. 899, in Hallam's Lit. of Europe.

"It is surely unnecessary to repeat the praises of such a man as Sir Thomas Bodley, a man whose name will only perish with that of his country. The obligations which literature owes to the exertions of this individual can only be estimated by those who have opportunity as well as occasion to consult the inestimable treasures he bequeathed to the place of his education. And it is with a mingled sensation of gratitude and pride, that the Editor of these ATHENA acknowledges the assistance he receives from the BODLEIAN LIBRARY, an institution which he boldly asserts to be the most useful as well as the most magnificent in the universe."—Athen. Oxon., Blaeu's Edn.

During the two centuries which had elapsed since Isaac Casaubon gratefully acknowledged that literary solace which enabled him, a wanderer in a strange land, to forget for a time the apostasy of his first-born and the murder of his king, how many of the sons of science thirsting for knowledge had drank deep at that fountain of learning,—and pronounced benedictions on the wise master-builder of that classic temple dedicated to intellectual progress—THE BODLEIAN LIBRARY AT OXFORD!

Boethius, Boece, or Boeis, Hector, b. about 1470, d. about 1550? was a native of Dundee, in the shire of Angus. After a course of study at Dundee and Aberdeen, he continued his education at the University of Paris. Elphinston, Bishop of Aberdeen, founded in that city about 1500, the King's College, and sent for Boethius to return and take the post of principal, which call he obeyed. Upon the death of the bishop, Boethius wrote his life, and the lives of his predecessors in that See. This work is entitled Vitæ Episcoporum Murthlacensium et Aberdonensium, Paris, 1522, 4to. The list commences with Beanus, the first bishop, and ends with Gavin Dunbar, who was bishop when the book was published. Boethius now undertook to write, also in Latin, a history of Scotland, commencing with remote antiquity, and ending with the death of James I. The first edition was pub. at Paris, in 1526, 4to, under the title of Scotorum Historia ab illius Gentis Origine. Of this edit. there were but 17 books. The author continued to enlarge and improve it until his death about 1550. (?) Another edit. was pub. in Paris in 1574, folio, containing 18 books, and part of a 19th, added by Boethius, and a continuation by John Ferrier, a Piedmontese, bringing down the history to the reign of James III. This History was trans. by order of James V., by John Ballenden, under which name the reader will find an account of the version referred to. So rare are copies of the original trans. that the Roxburghe copy sold for £65, and the Towneley copy for £85. Sir Walter Scott edited a reprint, (200 copies,) Edin., 1821, 2 vols. 4to. Ballenden's translations are considered to be the finest specimens of the old Scottish language extant. Boethius has been more praised and blamed than most authors:

"Of all Scots historians, next to Buchanan, Boethius has been the most censured and commended by the learned men who have mentioned him."—MACKENZIE.

"In the first six books there are a great many particulars not to be found in Fordun, or any other writer now extant; unless the authors which he pretends to have seen be hereafter discovered, he will continue to be shrewdly suspected for the contrivance of almost as many tales as Geoffrey of Monmouth."—BR. NICOLSON.

"In the 18th book he has treated of things in so comprehensive a manner, that no one could have done it more fully or significantly on the same subject."—FRASER.

"His style has all the purity of Cæsar's, and is so nervous both in the reflections and diction, that he seems to have absolutely entered into the spirit of Livy, and made it his own."

"He was a man of an extraordinary happy genius, and of great eloquence."—ERASMUS, an intimate friend.

"He was a great master of polite learning, well skilled in divinity, philosophy, and history; but somewhat credulous, and much addicted to the belief of legendary stories."

"He may be justly revered as one of the revivers of elegant learning. The style of Boethius, though, perhaps, not always rigorously pure, is formed with great diligence upon ancient models, and wholly uninfected with monastic barbarity. His history is written with elegance and vigour, but his fabulousness and credulity are justly blamed. His fabulousness, if he was the author of fictions, is a fault for which no apology can be made; but his credulity may be excused in an age when all men were credulous."—Dr. Johnson's Tour in Scotland, which see; also Mackenzie's Lives; *Biog. Bogan, Zachary, 1625-1659, an English Puritan, educated at St. Alban's Hall, and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, wrote Additions to Rous's Archaeologia Atticæ, the 5th edit. of which was pub. Oxf., 1658, 4to; Views of Scriptural Threats and Punishments, Oxf., 1653, 8vo; Meditations, &c., 1653, 8vo; Help to Prayer, 1650, 12mo; and a work pub. 1658, 8vo, drawing comparisons between the writings of Homer and the Holy Scriptures.

"The design of this learned, and now rare, philological work, is to point out the similarity of many forms of expression in Homer to those which occur in Scripture."—ORME.

"The author states that it is not his intention to institute any comparison between the sacred writers and their opinions and Homer, but simply between their idioms and ways of speaking."—T. H. HOARE.

Bogan added Hesiodus, &c., to show how Hesiod expresses himself very nearly in the same manner as Homer.

Bogart, Alexander H., 1804-1826, an American poet, died before he had contributed any thing of consequence to the literature of the country.

Bogart, Elizabeth, a native and resident of New York, is a daughter of the Rev. David S. Bogart of that city. Under the signature of ESTELLE, Miss Bogart has contributed many articles to The New York Mirror and other periodicals. Four of her prose tales have been honoured by prizes. Few pieces of American poetry deserve higher commendation than the pathetic lines, "He comes too late," &c.

"It is one of the best works for its size on the evidences of Christianity, and as an introduction to the New Testament. . . . The sentiments are excellent, the language perspicuous, and the reasoning cogent and convincing."—OWEN.

This work was intended to form a continuation of Neal's History of the Puritans.

"It is far superior to Neal's History both in point of execution and general interest. The origin and progress of Dissent is a subject, however, that still wants to engage the interest of some philosophical historian."—Dr. Jamieson's Cyc. R. Biog.

Bohn, Henry G., an enterprising London publisher and bibliophile, of German parentage, was b. in London, about the year 1800, and is favourably known as the editor of Bibliotheca Parviana and the translator of some pieces from the German. Mr. Lynes thus handsomely acknowledges Mr. B.'s intelligent labours in the former capacity:

"This Preface must not be concluded, without a distinct acknowledgment of the obligations incurred to Mr. Bohn, jun., for the great labour which he has bestowed in compiling this work, as well as for the judgment and knowledge which he has shewn in correcting errors occasioned by the indistinct handwriting of Dr. FARR, or the blunders of his various amanuenses."—John Lynes, Rectory, Stowley Lodge, 21st May, 1827; Preface to Bibliotheca Parviana.

Mr. B. translated vol. iv. of Schiller's Works, (Bohn's Library,) containing The Robbers, &c.; also, A Polyglott of Foreign Proverbs: comprising French, Italian, German, Dutch, Spanish, Portuguese, and Danish. Compiled Handbook of Games. Ed. Addison's Works, 6 vols.; Lowndes's Bibliographer's Manual, enlarged with revisions and corrections, in 8 Pts., forming 4 vols., 1857-58, &c. Mr. B. observes,

"The publication was undertaken more as a boon to his confrères and to literary men than as an object of mercantile profit; and he trusts it will be received as such."

But Mr. Bohn's MAGNUM OPUS is his "monster" Guinea Catalogue, Lon., 1841, enormously thick non-descripto, Teutonic shape, Tub model! But the London Literary Gazette gave so graphic a description of this plethoric tome on its first appearance, that we can do no better than quote it in lieu of any sketch of our own:

"Mr. Bohn has outdone all former doings in the same line, and given us a literary curiosity of remarkable character. The volume is the quaintest and the fattest we ever saw. It is an alderman among books, and not a very tall one; and then, alderman-like, its inside is richly stuffed with a multitude of good things. Why, there is a list of more than 23,000 articles, and the pages reach to 1948! . . . This catalogue has cost him an outlay of upwards of £2000, and it describes 300,000 volumes; a stock which could hardly be valued at much less than a plum."

The same excellent periodical describes another book-seller's catalogue under notice as "a shrimp, compared with Mr. Bohn's big fish."

Having long made Bibliography our special study, we may be allowed to express the opinion that the Guinea Catalogue is an invaluable lexicon to any literary man, and ten guineas would be a cheap price for a work calculated to save time by its convenience for reference, and money by its stores of information as to the literary and pecuniary value of coveted tomes. As an eminent benefactor to the reading public, by the republication in a cheap form of costly and valuable works, as the projector of the Standard Library, 130 vols., Scientific Lib., Illustrated Lib., Lib. of French Memoirs, Lib. of Extra Volumes, Classical Lib., (consisting of translations of the Greek and Latin Classics), Antiquarian Lib., Philologico-Philosophical Lib., Historical Lib., Library of British Classics, Ecclesiastical Lib., Miniature Lib., and Cheap Series,—numbering in all upwards of five hundred volumes,—Mr. Bohn does not need our praise, but he cannot refuse our gratitude.

Bohun, Edmund, d. about 1702? admitted Fellow-commoner of Queen's College, Cambridge, in 1663, subsequently served as a Justice of the Peace. He pub. a number of works, 1683-94: we notice a few. A Defence of Sir Robert Filmer, Lon., 1684. The History of the Desertion, [of James II.,] 1689, 8vo. The Justice of Peace's Calling, 1684. Boker, George H., b. 1824, is a native of Philadelphia, the son of Charles S. Boker, Esq., President of the Girard Bank of that city. At nineteen years of age, Mr. Boker graduated B.A. at Nassau Hall, Princeton College, New Jersey. After travelling for some time in England and on the Continent, Mr. B. returned to Philadelphia, where he now resides. He first appeared as an author in 1847, when he pub. The Lesson of Life, and other Poems.

"In this were indications of a manly temper and a cultivated mind, but it had the customary faults of youthful compositions in occasional feebleness of epithet, indistinctness, diffusiveness, and a certain kind of romanticism, that betrays a want of experience of the world."—R. W. GUISWOLD: Poets and Poetry of America.

"It contains many pleasing passages, yet frequently shows a want of care and finish in the execution. A pure and elevated tone of sentiment pervades it throughout, and it embodies enough of poetic thought, were the poem compressed to half its present length, to make it a production of a high order of merit."—Literary World, ii. 566.

Mr. Boker now turned his attention to the drama, and in 1848 produced Calaynos, a Tragedy, which was played with great success both in America and England.

"It is a clear and classic piece of composition, reminding one, by its elevated purity of tone, of Talfourd's Ion, though it is marked by much greater dramatic spirit and power than that didactic drama. . . . Calaynos, without any adventitious recommendation, unheralded by a popular name, and unaided by a popular theme, was eminently successful, not only in this country, but in England, and immediately placed its author in the front rank of living dramatists."—ROBERT T. CONRAD.

Mr. Boker's next production was Anne Boleyn, a Tragedy, [1850.]

"Which in many respects surpasses Calaynos, evincing more skill in the use of language, more force in the display of passion, and a finer vein of poetical feeling, with the same admirable contrast of character, and unity and directness of conduct."—R. W. GUISWOLD.

To this succeeded The Betrothal; Leonor de Guzman, a Tragedy; and Francesca da Rimini. The limited space to which we are confined prevents any examination into the merits of these compositions. Plays and Poems, Bost., 1856, 2 vols. 12mo.

"The glow of his images is chastened by a noble simplicity, keeping them within the line of human sympathy and natural expression. He has followed the masters of dramatic writing with rare judgment. He also excels many gifted poets of his class in a quality essential to an acted play—spirit. To the tragic ability he unites aptitude for the easy, colloquial, and jocose dialogue, such as must intervene in the genuine Shaksperian drama, to give relief and additional effect to high emotion. His language, also, rises often to the highest point of energy, pathos, and beauty."—H. T. TUCKERMAN: Characteristics of Literature, 2d Series.

"The age has not produced a poem more graceful than The Podesta's Daughter, nor scarcely one so distinguished for its simple and genuine, but deep and thrilling, pathos. The reader who can forbear to drop upon the page the tribute of a tear to the gentle Guille,

"Sweeter far
Than rose or lily, violet or vine, Though they could gather all their charms in one," would weep for nothing. Can the literature of our land boast any thing more purely original, more luxuriantly imaginative, than The Ivory Career? His Song of the Earth, also, is bold, animated, and displays wonderful power; and I have a Cottage is not surpassed, as a specimen of descriptive sweetness and beauty, in our own or in any language."—R. Bold, John, 1679–1757, a native of Leicester, was matriculated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and, entering into holy orders, took the curacy of Stony Staunton, Leicestershire, where he zealously laboured on a small pittance for about fifty years. He wrote—1. The Sin and Danger of Neglecting the Public Service of the Church, 1745, 8vo. 2. Religion the most Delightful Employment. 3. The Duty of Worthy Communicating.

"He had talents that might have rendered him conspicuous anywhere, and an impressive and correct delivery. . . . He appears from the early age of 24 years to have formed his plan of making himself a living sacrifice for the benefit of his flock."

Bolingbroke, Henry St. John, Viscount, 1678–1751, was the only son of Sir Henry St. John, of Lydiard Tregose, in Wiltshire, Baronet, by Mary, second daughter, and coheirss of Robert Rich, third Earl of Warwick, of that family. Henry was born at Battersea, in Surrey, October 1, 1678,—though 1672 has often been erroneously assigned as the date of his birth. He was brought up under the eye of his grandmother, a Presbyterian, who placed him under the tutorage of the celebrated Puritan preacher, Daniel Burgess, who resided in the family. Bolingbroke tells Pope, long afterwards, at the end of the epistle to Sir W. Wyndham, that he was obliged, while yet a boy, to read over the commentaries of Dr. Manton, whose "Pride it was to have made a hundred and nineteen sermons on the hundred and nineteenth Psalm."

At Eton he became acquainted with Sir Robert Walpole, and a rivalry here commenced which continued through life. He removed from Eton to Christ Church, Oxford, where, as subsequently, he was distinguished for his talents, brilliancy of conversation, fascinating manners, and remarkable personal beauty. He left college only to continue a course of the wildest profligacy, which caused his parents, with the hope of his reformation, to bring about a match between the dissolute youth and the daughter and coheirss of Sir Henry Winchescomb. This experiment, to reform a rake by the sacrifice of an innocent female, ended as such ventures generally do. In a short time they separated, and were never again united. During his exile she died in England, and in 1720 Bolingbroke espoused the widowed Marchioness de Villette, a niece of Madame Maintenon. They lived together for thirty years, and he survived her only about a year. In 1700 he was chosen to represent the borough of Wootton Bassett in Parliament. In 1704 he became Secretary of War, and held this post for three years, resigning in 1707, when Harley was dismissed from office. In 1710, upon the fall of the Godolphin administration, Harley came into power, and St. John became Secretary of State. In 1712 he was created Viscount Bolingbroke, and exhibited great chagrin at not being raised to an earldom. His father's congratulation on his new honours was something of the oddest:

"Ah, Harry," said he, "I ever said you would be hanged; but now I find you will be beheaded!"

The accession of George I. interposed an effectual barrier to the ambition of the courtier. Addison was made foreign secretary, and the Whigs determined to impeach Bolingbroke of high treason. Satisfied that his life was aimed at by his enemies, he fled in disguise, March 25, 1715, to Calais. By invitation of Charles Stuart, he visited him at Lorraine, and accepted the post of his Secretary of State, which caused his impeachment and attainder. In 1723 he was permitted to return home, and his estates were restored to him, but the House of Lords was still closed against him. He now, in conjunction with Wyndham and Pulteney, who were in Parliament, commenced a fierce war against Sir Robert Walpole, which lasted for ten years. The Craftsman, by Caleb D'Anvers, was the vehicle of their vigorous and bitter attacks. Such was the popularity of this paper, which commenced Dec. 6, 1725, and extended to 14 vols. 12mo, that 10,000 to 12,000 copies were sometimes sold in one day. In 1736 he again visited France, where he resided until the death of his father, in 1742, when he retired to the family seat at Battersea for the rest of his earthly existence, which was terminated by a cancer in the face in 1751.

The notorious David Mallet was his lordship's literary legatee, and in 1754 he pub. an edition of his works in 5 vols. 4to. To these 2 vols. 4to, of Correspondence, State Papers, &c., were added by G. Parke, in 1798. In some of the Essays in the collected edition appeared those skeptical opinions which had been less boldly advanced in his lifetime. During his life there appeared a Letter to Swift, 1715, fol.; the Representation, 1715, 4to; His Case, 1715, 8vo; Dissertations upon Parties, 1735, 4to; these Dissertations, together with the Letters in the Study and Use of History, first appeared in the Craftsman; Remarks on the History of England, 1743, 8vo; Letters on the Spirit of Patriotism; on the Idea of a Patriot King, and on the State of Parties at the Accession of George I., 1749, 8vo. The Idea of a Patriot King had been intrusted to Pope, who had printed and circulated many more copies than the author intended. His story is well known, and need not now be repeated. Mallet was employed to edit the edition pub. 1749, and the Advertisement, severely reflecting upon Pope, has brought down much censure on his lordship's memory. But a far graver offence rests upon the name of Bolingbroke—his impious attacks upon Revelation. Johnson's opinion of the author of these "wild and pernicious ravings under the name of philosophy" is well known:

"Sir, he was a scoundrel, and a coward: a scoundrel for charging a blunderbus against religion and morality; a coward because he had not resolution to fire it off himself, but left half-crown to a beggarly Scotchman, to draw the trigger after his death."

No doubt Mr. David Mallet considered the post of cannoner sufficient honour to counterbalance the condemnation which his editorial duties encountered. Dr. Johnson would not honour either author or editor by perusal; for when Mr. Burney asked him if he had seen Warburton's book against Bolingbroke's Philosophy, he answered in his characteristic manner:

"No, sir, I have never read Bolingbroke's impiety, and, therefore, am not interested about its confutation."

The name of Warburton naturally suggests the ingenious artifice of Burke in his imitation of Lord Bolingbroke in the Vindication of Natural Society. Both Warburton and Lord Chesterfield were among the believers in the authenticity of this eloquent forgery. Among the great men of his time Bolingbroke stood proudly pre-eminent. Swift, slow to find or acknowledge merit in any man, considered himself exalted in lauding St. John, and Pope hardly stops short of paying him divine honours. Witness the idolatrous enthusiasm of the following:

"I really think there is something in that great man which looks as if he was placed here by mistake. When the comet appeared to us a month or two ago, I had sometimes an imagination that it might possibly be come to our world to carry him home; as a coach comes to one's door for other visitors."—Spence's Anec.

That Bolingbroke was sufficiently mortal to reciprocate human affection we have undoubted evidence. He watched over the form of the dying bard, and watered his pillow with his tears. On one of these affecting occasions, Spence tells us, he cried "over him for a considerable time with more concern than can be expressed. 'O great God! what is man?' said Lord B., looking on Mr. Pope, and repeating it several times, interrupted with sobs. 'I have known him these thirty years; and value myself more for that man's love,—than—'[sinking his head, and losing his voice in tears.] Yet fain would this friend have excluded from the dying pillow of the man he so loved, the last consolations which can minister to the soul of the departing:

"The priest had scarce departed when Bolingbroke, coming over from Battersea, flew into a great fit of passion and indignation on the occasion of his being called in."—Warron.

But when the day of darkness fell on the proud philosopher, the sophistry to which he trusted proved indeed a broken reed!

"He was overcome with terrors and excessive passion in his last illness. After one of his fits of passion, he was overheard by Sir Henry Mildmay complaining to himself, and saying, 'What will my gaze and earings for all these things?"—Dr. W. in Spencer's Autobiography.

Alas, indeed, for the desolate soul which in that trying hour must pass through the valley of the shadow of death, without the rod and the staff of the Shepherd, the strength of the Comforter, and the fatherly benediction of the great Judge of all the earth! "Enter not then, my soul, into their secret," unto their assembly "be not thou united!" What a contrast does the "inimitable hour" of Bolingbroke and that of Addison present to our consideration!

Pope had no hesitation in declaring the object of his admiration to be the first writer, as well as the greatest man, of his age. Many interesting records of his enthusiasm will be found in Spencer's Autobiography. Forster has not endorsed the verdict of his contemporaries. In his Lectures on the Study and Use of History, and those on Patriotism and Idea of a Patriot King, and his other works, we are charmed by grace of composition of no ordinary character; but when we seek for evidence of solid judgment, and the results of dispassionate reflection, we shall find our labour in vain. To quote from the most masterly analysis with which we are acquainted of the political and literary character of Saint-John.

"Bolingbroke's abilities were exactly of that stamp which astonish and fascinate those who come into personal contact with their possessor,—more brilliant than solid,—more showy than substantial. His mind was not a profound one, but what it wanted in this respect was amply made up by the readiness and acuteness. He seemed to grasp every thing by intuition, and no writer had so made himself master of a proposition or an argument, than his astonishing mastery enabled him to bring forth vast stores of information and illustration of a moment's varying. Endowed with a brilliant imagination,—a prodigious flow of words,—a style which fascinated the reader by the incomparable beauty of the language and the bounding elasticity of the sentences, and an extraordinary power of presenting his conceptions in the clearest light,—his contemporaries looked upon him as one of those rare beings who seem to be endowed with a nature superior to that of common mortality and who stamp down to the world only to enrich their memory of all his law, and their superiority to its inhabitants. But, deceived as they were by the vast surface of the stream, they failed to inquire into its depth. We, in modern times, who know nothing of the artificial splendor with which a 'new swelling brook'—a manner that seemed given to every man,—and a most dazzling style of conversation,—invested the name of Bolingbroke, are perhaps justified, by the exaggeration of the praise once lavished on him, to do him but scanty justice."—Channing's Essay History.

Pope himself admitted that there might be a limit even to the genius of his "Saint-John," when he remarked

"If ever Bolingbroke writes, it must be when he turns divine."

Mr. Warton confirms this opinion:

"When Tully attempted poetry, he became as ridiculous as Bolingbroke when he attempted philosophy and divinity; we look in vain for that genius which produced the Discussions on Fortitude. In the tedious philosophical works, of which it is an exaggerated satire to say that the reason of them is sophistical and bombastical, the style diffuse and verbose, and the learning seemingly confined to them not drawn from the originals, but picked up and polished from French editions and translations."—Warton's Life of Pope.

Upon the general merits of Bolingbroke as an author, Dr. Blair has some very judicious remarks:

"Among English writers the [vehement]; though mixed in Bolingbroke. Bolingbroke was kinder the demagogue of a style that runs through all his debasing with him, rather than abounds in rhetorical figures. Impetuously He is eloquent in nature as to many different views. He is bold, rather than correct; a torrent that flows strong, but often madly. His sentences are varied as to length and shortness. Involving, however, most to long periods, sometimes including parentheses, and frequently crowding and lumping a multitude of things upon one another as naturally happens in the warmth of speaking. In the choice of his words, there is great facility and precision. In exact construction of sentences, he is much inferior to Lord Shaftesbury, but greatly superior to him in style and ease. Upon the whole, his merit as a writer would have been very considerable, if his manner had equalled his style. But whilst we find many things to commend in the latter in the former, as I before remarked, we are hardly less so to commend. To his commendings, for the most part he is flimsy and false in his political writings, however, in what he calls his philosophical ones, irreligious and contradictory in the highest degree. It is indeed my opinion that there are few writings in the English language, which, like the matter contained in them, can be read with less profit or truth, than Lord Bolingbroke's works."—Blair's Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, see Lectures 12, 18, 19, and 24.

He appears to have carried into his death the same heat and impetuosity which animated his soul in the tempest of debate. . . There is a fire, a spirit of vivacity in the composition of Bolingbroke, which, when accompanied as it occasionally the man, with propriety and ease, must give him rank as one of the happiest masters of the vehement style."—Drake's Essays, p. 104.

"Vivacious Bolingbroke, with the most agreeable talents in the world, and with great parts, was neither happy nor successful. He wrote against the late king, who had forgiven him; against Sir Robert Walpole, who did forgive him; against the Forerunner and the clergy, who never forgive him. He is one of our best writers though his attacks on all governments and all religions (nothing of which views he avowed himself to own) have necessarily involved his style in a vast of personality. One must know the man before one can give his meaning. He has two other faults, which one should not expect in the same author, such as theology and great want of connection."—Walpole's H. and N. Authors.

"He wrote against Sir Robert Walpole because he did not forgive him, and because he prevented his being returned to them, however which he wished to recover. That Sir Robert was implacable against him, appears from a speech which he made in the House, and which he concluded with the following expression:—'May his attitude never be reversed, and may his crimes never be forgotten!'"—Monthly Rev., vol. 30, Part's Walpole's H. and N. Authors.

Lord Bolingbroke had early made himself master of men and books but in his first career of life, being immersed at once in business and pleasure, he was through a variety of causes in a surprising manner. When his passions subsided by years and disappointments, and when he improved his rational faculties by more grave studies and reflection, he came out in his retirement with a lustre peculiar to himself, though not seen by vulgar eyes. The gay statesman was changed into a philosopher equal to any of the ages of antiquity. The wisdom of Seneca, the dignity and ease of Pliny, and the wit of Horace, appeared in all his writings and conversations."—Edm. of Oakes's Memoirs of Dean Swift.

"The name of Bolingbroke has been repeatedly lauded by Blackstone and Blackburn, while his indelible services have been ably refuted by Warburton and Leland. Lord Walpole, who knew him well, calls him a wicked impostor and a charlatan."—Part's Walpole's H. and N. Authors.

Warburton, who defended the memory of Pope against the attacks of Mallock, (Bolingbroke?) felt it incumbent upon him as a divine to take up the lance in championship of those sacred truths which his lordship's Essays as ruthlessly assailed. His View of Lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy, in two Letters to a Friend, 1754, '55, would have been ill brooked by the noble author had it appeared in his lifetime. The many absurdities into which his lordship's eagerness to attack the truth caused him to fall, will be seen by reference to a book which should be in every theological library—Leland's View of Doctrinal Writers. With talents so well qualified to benefit his race, it is a mortally reflection that the gifted Bolingbroke lived a worse than useless life, and that of him it could not be said, "There was hope in his latter end!"

Dr. Bond does not seem to have been much of a favourite with that stout Loyalist and strict Churchman, the never-to-be-forgotten old Anthony Wood.

"This J. Bond, by the way, you must know being scarce warm in the pulpit, but he began to threaten heaven with some of his divinity. . . . In all which sermons, as in others which he delivered in London and Westminster, are contained many strange positions, rebellious doctrines, religious cantings, and I know not what. . . . These things I thought fit to let the reader know, that posterity may distinguish between the said two Bonds, [see Bond, John, ante.] the first a polite and rare critic, whose labours have advanced the commonwealth of learning very much, and the other an impudent, canting, and blasphemous person, who, by his doctrine, did lead people to rebellion, advanced the cause of Satan much, and in fine by his, and the endeavours of his brethren, brought all things to ruin, merely to advance their unstable and ambitious desires. . . . His father, Dennis Bond, shewed himself a devotee to Oliver's interest. On the 30th of Aug., 1668, being then Monday, and the windiest day that had before happened for 20 years, he paid his last debt to nature, being then tormented with the strangury, and much anxiety of spirit. At which time, as the then vulgar talk was, the devil came to take away Oliv. Cromwell, who then lay on his death-bed, but being not prepared for him, he gave Bond for his future appearance, and accordingly on Friday following, being the 3d of Sept., he made good his promise."—*Athen.
